[Redacted]

[Redacted] observes that "there are no indications of an imminent attack." The comment continues, however, to point out that the Communists have made good use of the relative quiet provided by the cease-fire to reinforce, both in men and materiel, and to re-deploy and retrain their units.

The enemy, [Redacted] is able to launch a major offensive with little warning. The duration of such an attack would depend on the Communists' ability to keep their advancing units supplied.
