National Liberation Front to maintain its international position in the face of increasingly effective competition from its rival, the Communist-backed Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). Roberto's Angolan Peoples' Union and its associate in the Front, the Angolan Democratic party, apparently still control most of the rebel activity in Angola. While the MPLA has been unable to mount any operations in Angola, it has been exploiting the general dissatisfaction of African governments with Roberto's continued refusal to merge with the MPLA. Roberto's representatives apparently are touring Africa to drum up support for his organization, but African governments--particularly the radical Casablanca group--are likely to delay recognition, especially if the MPLA forms a rival government. MPLA spokesmen have already charged that Roberto's action has "betrayed the cause of Angolan nationalism."
