

A very large percentage of the people in both Lima and Caracas were ashamed and humiliated at the incidents and had their eyes opened as never before to the Communist menace. There were governmental shake-ups in both countries; Communists were arrested; certain reorganizations took place in the police administrations. Even the students at San Marcos University in Lima took action to oust Communists elected to the Student Council and other student organizations. This was done on their own initiative and without prodding from the government.