1. [redacted] from the [redacted] Training Office reported to [redacted] that last Friday a young woman came to her office to submit a request to enter one of the September Voluntary Language classes. When informed that the VLTP was being suspended for a year she expressed great disappointment and said that the possibility of receiving language training during off-duty hours was one of the inducements offered by the recruiting officer at the University of Georgia.

2. Various components of the Agency have indicated a need for people who can recognize Chinese characters without necessarily being able to speak or read Chinese. These include personnel working with Chinese map materials and Chinese personal names. [redacted] has taken the matter up with [redacted] our senior Chinese instructor, [who] feels that such a course would be workable and useful. At present it seems that a two-semester, part-time course would be ideal. The first semester of about 130 hours (22 weeks at 6 hours per week) would cover recognition of characters including simplified forms, use of Chinese-English dictionaries and the telecode book, and a limited amount of recognition of commonly used characters. A second semester could be offered covering the cursive forms of Chinese characters including the so-called "grass writing". Some lead-time will be needed to prepare the course but it could easily be done in time for the spring semester of 1966. If necessary the course could be started sooner with a minimum lead-time of about 60 days.
