on 13 April and was attended by:

in Foreign Countries

to determine what might be done to alleviate the situation. He explained that any and all suggestions would be welcome, regardless of how far out or speculative they might be. He asked that no suggestion be withheld with the thought that it might not be feasible, pointing out that such judgment could best be made by the Department of State.

3. It soon became apparent that while the present problem (kidnaping) might be new, the basic situation had been considered before under various guises (aircraft hijacking) and what we were looking for were solutions that had been previously sought after without complete success. For convenience, the present discussions were broken down into the following areas:

A. Prediction of Where and When Kidnapings Would Take Place
