SUPPLEMENT

1. Most of the troops at Dzamlin Ude (111-13, 44-30), an important advance base for the Mongolian People's Republic Army, are those Inner Mongolians who surrendered to the Outer Mongolian Army in 1945.

Note: Dzamiin Ude is on the road between Kalgan and Ulan Bator (Urga), just inside the border of the Mongolian People's Republic.7

2. In the middle of May 1945, the Outer Mongolian troops who were stationed in Dzamin Ude gained control of the ten hoshuns in Silingol Aimak in a few hours time.
3. After the Chinese Communists had occupied a part of Inner Mongolia, (which part not stated) /presumably a part of Chahar Province/ they sent a number of their inspectors to various places in the occupied zone. They were unable to fulfill their mission; hence, the Communists sent out Mongolian inspectors who were trained under the auspices of the Eighth Route Army. In August 1946, six Mongolian inspectors went to Peitzumiao (116-10, 43-50) from Kalgan.
