1. In early September 1951, pamphlets began to appear among employees of a Sofia railway depot referring to the miserable existence they lead by virtue of the norms demanded of them and the meagerness of their wages when compared to the cost of living. These pamphlets had a considerable effect, and the railwaymen came very near to striking before the militia was warned of their frame of mind. The arrival of a militia detachment to restore discipline led to a fight, the railwaymen attacking the militia with crow bars when the latter were unsympathetic to their grievances.
2. Subsequently, it was discovered that the person responsible for the pamphlets was the manager of the depot, who had typed them himself in the privacy of his office.
