The situation is complicated by reports that the country's supply of rice--a staple food--will be exhausted within the next 10 days, with the possibility that a new shipment will not arrive soon. At this stage it is probable that the new government has not focused on such matters as food imports. A severe rice shortage would put tremendous strains on the new regime and the potential for additional violence may increase.

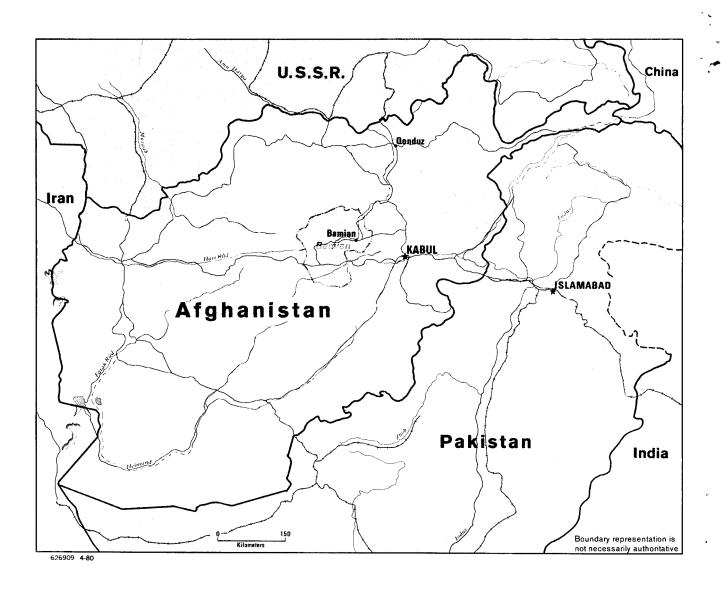

The new leaders have expressed a desire to maintain close relations with the US, but held out the prospect that they may have to turn elsewhere—in an apparent reference to the Soviets—if expectations of US support are not met. The new leaders assured US officials that they would respect all contracts and agreements between Liberia and the US,

The Indian-Pakistani dialogue on Afghanistan continued this weekend with the visit to Islamabad of Indira Gandhi's personal envoy, former Foreign Minister Swaran Singh, who met with Zia. The language of the communique indicated the two sides remain divided on Soviet intervention but have agreed to continue consultations. In a tacit admission that no progress was made on the issue of arms aid to Pakistan, Zia's foreign affairs adviser told a press conference that "concrete proposals" would be discussed at their next meeting.

Top Secret 25X' BRIEFS AND COMMENTS
LEBANON: Clashes Between Christian and UN Forces
Israeli-supported Christian militiamen and UN troops in south- ern Lebanon, in the worst incident between the two groups to date, clashed on Saturday as Israeli troops were withdrawing from the UN sector.
One UN soldier and one militiaman died during the brief exchange of fire Saturday near At Tiri, a village in the UN sector where the militia began attempting to establish a position a week ago. In response to casualties and the loss of an armored vehicle, militiamen fired tank, artillery, and mortar shells at several other UN positions. The UN force headquarters at Naqurah sustained heavy damage.
The situation appeared to have calmed yesterday, but the growing problems between the militia and the UN have yet to be resolved. Relations between the militia and the UN have deteriorated steadily since the UN decided earlier this year to try to staff five observation outposts deep within the Christian enclave with new personnel.
Christian leader Saad Haddad has opposed manning the outposts with the new teams, probably with tacit Israeli backing. The UN wants to return to staffing all of the outposts, established in 1972, with observers from the UN Truce Supervision Organization. The prospect of experienced UNTSO personnel, including US officers, manning these outposts apparently has made Haddad and the Israelis concerned that their movements and actions in the border area would come under closer scrutiny. Efforts by the UN to carry out the new staffing over the last few weeks have met with consistent harassment by Haddad's forces.
Israeli forces apparently have completed the with-drawal promised Friday by Defense Minister Weizman from the positions they established in and near the UN sector last Wednesday.

INDONESIA: Anti-Chinese Violence
Security officials fear that anti-Chinese riots in Udjung Pandang, a major city in eastern Indonesia, will incite ethnic violence in other cities.
Indonesian mobs sacked Chinese stores on two successive nights before the government declared a curfew and restored order. The riots were set off by rumors that a Chinese shopowner had tortured an Indonesian maidservant to death.
The Chinese control most urban commerce and much of the rest of the Indonesian economy. The government will try to limit reporting of the Udjung Pandang riots in order to prevent deeply felt anti-Chinese animosity from erupting into violence.
Local officials in Medan, North Sumatra, are particularly concerned; militant students have staged a series of demonstrations in recent days against Chinese involvement in local gambling syndicates and alleged corruption of government officials.
The government's concern about anti-Chinese demonstrations is broader than the obvious fear of spreading civil disorder. Most government officials have close ties to rich Chinese merchants, and the authorities always worry that anti-Chinese protests will take on antigovernment overtones.

PORTUGAL: Presidential Politics
Army General Soares Carneiro apparently has agreed to be the ruling Democratic Alliance's candidate in the presidential election later this yeara move that underscores the Sa Carneiro government's feud with President Eanes and threatens to divide the military.
Soares Carneiro had set two conditionssupport from the military and freedom to play an active role as president. Prime Minister Sa Carneiro apparently accepted the latter condition.
President Eanes, who is also chief of the armed forces, is a possible contender. He may have tried to line up support for his candidacy in late March when he reportedly announced his plans to resign his chief of staff position. If Eanes does intend to run, it could lead to bitter infighting in the military.
Soares Carneiro is considered an outstanding troop commander and generally regarded as the "thinker" in the armed forces. He would be a strong opponent for Eanes, though he lacks public exposure so far. Eanes is still the popular figure in Portugal, but his stock with the military is at an all-time low.
The Democratic Alliance hopes to announce its candidate within the next few days in order to preempt Eanes. So long as Eanes is not a declared candidate, Sa Carneiro can avoid criticism that he is splitting the armed forces by putting forth his own military candidate.

IRAQ: Economic Aid

Baghdad last year tripled its aid commitments and doubled its disbursements of economic aid to developing countries without major petroleum resources. Iraq's aid commitment of $1 billion in 1979 places it second only to Saudi Arabia among Arab OPEC aid donors. Iraq also is implementing a loan program of roughly $200 million to compensate selected developing countries for oil surcharges levied last year. The Iraqis were primarily responsible for the decision made at the Arab Summit in November 1978 to extend over $3 billion in grants to Syria and Jordan. Baghdad was the first donor to fulfill its commitment—over $500 million—in 1979 and has already disbursed the first of three installments this year.

SPECIAL ANALYSIS

ISRAEL: The Labor Alternative

Labor Party leaders, buoyed by polls showing that the electorate clearly prefers them to Prime Minister Begin's Likud-dominated government, have been discussing how the party should proceed with the peace negotiation process if it is returned to power. There appears to be a broad consensus within Labor favoring a strategy using the transitional framework of the Camp David accords to attract Jordan into negotiations for a final peace agreement.

Labor Party chief Shimon Peres, whose views dominate Labor thinking on the negotiations, met with West Bank and Gaza leaders last week

Labor is committed to the Camp David process and would carry out any agreement on transitional arrangements reached in the current negotiations. If Labor were to come to power with negotiations for the proposed self-governing authority still going on, the party would continue with them-despite some misgivings about the framework. It would probably be willing to offer concessions, however, on important areas like land, water, and Jewish settlements, in the hope of attracting Jordan and Palestinian representatives to the talks. Labor would probably use the five-year transition period to test its ideas for arranging a final peace agreement with Jordan.

The major difference between the Likud and Labor lies in their approaches to the ultimate disposition of the West Bank and Gaza territories occupied in 1967. The Likud favors permanent Israeli control--perhaps through annexation--while Labor leans towards territorial concessions to Jordan.

PARK ARA LAKERY

Labor's policy toward the West Bank and Gaza has traditionally rested on the "demographic argument." Pointing to the slow growth of Israeli Jewish population due to low birth rates and declining immigration, Labor's leaders have argued that the extremely high birth rate among West Bank and Gaza Arabs would mean an Arab majority in Israel as early as 2000 if those areas were permanently annexed. Israel could therefore maintain its Jewish character only by denying electoral freedoms to the Arab population, leaving a disenfranchised, hostile Arab majority and eroding the democratic character of the state.

Labor's Partition Plan

If Labor could entice Hussein into negotiations for a final agreement, the party probably would agree to a territorial partition along the following lines:

- -- Return of most of the populated areas to Jordanian control.
- -- Transfer of the Gaza Strip to Jordan.
- -- Retention by Israel of Greater Jerusalem, the Latrun Salient, and the Etzion Settlement Bloc. Other, generally minor, territorial demands might also be made.
- -- An Israeli security presence--perhaps based on some of the existing Israeli settlements--in the Jordan River Valley and the foothills of the eastern Samarian Mountains. Other security requirements such as demilitarization, monitoring devices, and international quarantees would also be sought.

Peres has hinted that he would be willing to negotiate the future of existing Israeli settlements in the areas to be returned to Jordan and might be prepared to work out a deal whereby Jordanian sovereignty would be accepted over some settlements. Labor would prefer that the areas returned to Jordan form a Palestinian entity under Jordanian sovereignty. Most of the party is as adamant as the Begin government that no Palestinian state be created.

Critics Within the Party

Some Labor Party members question the wisdom of pursuing an agreement with Jordan. They note that the proposal for negotiations with Amman originated several years ago when Hussein was more moderate than he now appears to be and before his rapprochement with the Palestine Liberation Organization. These critics note that Hussein has flatly ruled out negotiations with Israel on terms other than complete withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and that he has given no hint that he would be interested in a process that involves yielding territory to Israel. Thus, they argue, territorial partition is no longer a viable negotiation approach.

The extreme left of the party advocates total withdrawal to the 1967 borders--except for Jerusalem--and would accept the creation of a Palestinian state. More moderate members, like former Foreign Minister Abba Eban, have advocated a confederation of Jordan, Israel, and the West Bank along the lines of the Benelux federation. A few right wingers in the party more or less support Begin's position.

Coalition Problems

Despite its impressive showing in recent polls, Labor is unlikely to win a parliamentary majority if elections are held in the near future. The party would probably have to form a coalition to govern, most likely with the hawkish National Religious Party. Coalition politics--particularly if the Religious Party is a member-might well force Labor to modify its preferred negotiating position and follow a harder line.
