2. The contents of the Treaty are as follows:

Article I

The number of important air bases, artillery, and infantry military bases of the Chinese Communist forces will be increased. Soviet forces will be permitted to use more than forty percent of these military bases. Dairen and Fort Arthur will be ceded to the USSR for use as Soviet military bases, and the general populace and political and sovial organizations therein will move to various areas if deemed necessary for military operations; also, the military munitions factories will be turned over to the management of the Soviet military commands.

Article 2

Soviet Russia will aid North Korea by supplying various types of airplanes, artillery, tanks, and so forth, and, at the same time, will supply Soviet pilots for the Chinese and North Korean air bases with the proviso that they are supplied for participation in the Korean war.

Article 3

If necessary for military operations, the general populace and political and social organizations, including government agencies, factories, and industrial machines, will be moved to Manchuria from North Korea. Thus, all of North Korea will be used as a military base for the Chinese and North Korean forces.

Article 4

Communist China will build a number of air force bases in China by June 1952. Forty percent of all of the fall crops for 1951 will be sent to North Korea as rapidly as possible to provide food for the military forces and refugees in North Korea.

Article 5

The movement of personnel above the rank of division staff members of the Chinese and North Korean forces and the planning of military operations in the Korean war shall be decided by consultation within the Soviet-Chinese-North Korean Joint Military Committee. This committee is stationed in Peiping but is to establish a mission to be sent to North Korea as soon as possible. Technicians serving as Soviet military advisers shall be reinforced and sent to North Korea as instructors to the Chinese and North Korean forces in North Korea.
