WASHINGTON (AP) -- President Reagan will be presented by aides with a proposal for China policy next week that would commit Washington to resuming or even terminating some sales to Taiwan, an opponent of the proposed policy said Thursday.

Republican, especially conservative Republicans, see the proposals as violating the Taiwan Relations Act and believe it could harm the constituency that helped Reagan get elected in 1980, the New York Times reported said.

But no one seems likely to be encouraged to propose it on grounds that if Washington doesn't take steps to curtail some sales, Beijing will consider relations and that could hurt Reagan with Democrats and those favoring close relations with Beijing.

The information was volunteered to a reporter by Boby Jordan, national director of the American Council for Free Asia, which favors maintaining close U.S. ties to Taiwan. Jordan said he obtained the information from a high-level source in the State Department.

State Department officials say that there are no plans for the day, but he says that the State Department has received a proposal regarding the continuation of some arms sales to Taiwan for some time.

He says that the proposal is possible that will be presented to the president and he follows:

-- recommending there is no U.S. policy for long-term arms sales to Taiwan.

-- recommending a ceiling on future arms sales.

-- gradually reducing arms sales.

Jordan said the president also will be asked by the State Department to decide whether to add to the above a commitment to end arms sales eventually, this would be "option B."

Jordan said his source opposes the proposal since it is without the option for a commitment to terminate arms sales. Either way, he said it would violate the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act under which the United States obligated itself to provide Taiwan with arms to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability.
