| The regime presumably increased the term of service its recent conscription campaigns have failed. The change likely to affect most Afghan troops because soldiers are assigned to Kabul at some point in their enlistments. It also increase the number of civilians, particularly men, floafghanistan. | PERSPECTIVES  |                 |
| PAKISTAN AND THE REFUGEES   | 25 X 1   |
|   | 25 X 1   |
| Afghan refugees in Pakistan have not become a heavy economic or political liability for Islamabad. Frictions between them and Pakistanis could grow, however, and lead to serious problems for Islamabad in some circumstances. A sharp increase in tensions between Pakistanis and the refugees would erode political stability in Pakistan and perhaps cause Islamabad to seek an accommodation on the Soviet presence in Afghanistan with Kabul and Moscow.  | ،25X1       |
| Pakistani Government registration figures indicate that about 2.8 million Afghans are in Pakistan. The US Embassy, however, believes that multiple registrations, the registration of nonexistent dependents, and the return of some registered refugees to Afghanistan have inflated this figure. Based on reports of discrepancies between registrations and numbers actually in some refugee camps, the embassy believes that between 1.75 and 1.9 million Afghans are in Pakistani refugee camps. | 25X1            |
| New refugees continue to arrive in Pakistan but,  | 25X1            |
| the rate is now 2,000 to 3,000 a month compared to 100,000 or more a month a few years ago. Heavy fighting near the border can still bring a surge170,000 in the last four months of 1983but we believe most of these refugees return home when military operations die   | 25 X 1   |
| Most of the predominately Pushtun refugees reside in areas of Pakistan where cultural differences with the local population are   | 25X1            |
| minimal. About three-fourths are in the North-West Frontier Province near the Afghan border, and most of the remainder are in Baluchistan, primarily in Pushtun areas. Less than 2 percent are in Punjab and Sind Provinces. Islamabad plans to transfer about 300,000 refugees to camps in western Punjab, but less than 100,000 had moved by early February.  | ٠               |

| According to the Pakistani press, refugees are barred from buying real estate or engaging in business activities that would lead to permanent residence, but other economic activity is permitted. Most live in camps near the Afghan border by choice. Refugees are free to live in any part of Pakistan, although Islamabad has put restrictions on the movement of large groups. Some refugee groups that migrated seasonally from one part of Afghanistan to another have tried to follow the same pattern in Pakistan.   | 25X1         |
| Economic Factors  |              |
| Some Pakistanis claim that the refugees are taking jobs from local Pakistanis, forcing up rents and food prices, and living better than Pakistanis on largess from Islamabad. We believe that these claims are exaggerated and that the economic burden for Pakistan has not been excessive.  Pakistan of supporting the refugees is about $180 million a year, or some 2.5 percent of the budget. The movement of food and other refugee supplies costs Pakistan about $75 million. Other expenses include salaries of about 6,000 Pakistanis involved with refugee issues, education for some 70,000 refugee students, and support for 85 health units. When dealing with the United States and international relief agencies, we believe there is a tendency for Islamabad to pad its expenses.                                | 25X125X1 |
| Even if the Pakistani cost figures are accurate, however, they do not reflect the indirect benefits Pakistan receives from the relief effort. The US Embassy estimates that between 110,000 and 150,000 tons of donated food—a quarter to a third of the total supplied by international organizations—is reexported by the refugees to Afghanistan or sold in Pakistan. We believe that the proceeds from these sales generally remain in Pakistan. Pakistani businessmen, such as tent manufacturers and millers, have had lucrative contracts with relief organizations, and other Pakistanis are employed by these groups. The UN refugee organization estimates that it will spend about $60 million in Pakistan in the coming year, including $7 million to help defray the Pakistani Government's administrative expenses. | 25X1         |

| of Pakistani workers to the Gulf or are doing work done historically by migrant Afghan tribesmen. Because the refugees apparently receive more than enough food from international donors, and because prices have risen in parts of Pakistan where the refugee presence is negligible, we believe that there is little connection between the refugee influx and inflation. Nonetheless, US officials report that pressures generated by the refugees have had some impact on rents, at least in Quetta and Peshawar. | 25)           |
|  |               |
| The 70,000 Afghans being educated by Pakistan constitute only a small percentage of the over a million Afghan refugee children in the country. Moreover, less than one percent of Pakistan's medical personnel are assigned to refugee health centers. Pakistanis who lack adequate health care or whose children cannot go to school, however, are likely to believe that they suffer from the diversion of resources to the  | A             |
| refugees.  | 25)           |
| Law and Order  |               |
| US officials report that many Pakistanis believe the refugees have been a primary cause of growing crime and disorder in the North-West Frontier and Baluchistan. The evidence is contradictory. Refugees have committed some murders and robberies, and fighting between rival insurgent groups has occasionally broken out in Pakistan.  however, the crime rate in the province   | 25X125X1  |
| has not increased since the refugees began arriving.   | 25 X 1 |
| Violence has increased in Kurram Agency where there have been serious clashes between rival Shia and Sunni Pakistani tribes. Their dispute is centuries old, but we believe that the arrival of enough Afghan Sunnis to double the agency's population has contributed significantly to sectarian tensions. In the Khyber Agency, on the other hand, an increase in violence has been sparked by government efforts to eliminate heroin production and appears unrelated to the refugees.                              | 25)25)    |

|                             | If there were a significant decline in jobs for Pakistanis inthe Gulf, competition between returning workers and refugeescould become severe enough to lead to violence.  |  |
|                             | — If foreign assistance declined, Islamabad would have to assumemore of the relief effort and cut back on other Pakistaniprograms, or reduce support for the refugees. The latter optionmight cause a violent reaction in the camps and greater refugeepressure on local economies.   |  |
|                             | If Soviet military pressure drove hundreds of thousands ofadditional Afghans into Pakistan, facilities in areas where mostrefugees now live would be overburdened, lowering livingstandards and increasing tensions. If the government tried tomove the refugees to other areas, it would meet resistance bothfrom Afghans unwilling to leave the border areas and fromPakistanis in non-Pushtun areas. |  |

-- If the refugee stay is prolonged, overgrazing by refugee herds and the felling of trees for firewood could cause an economic decline that would increase antirefugee sentiment. As the refugees come to see themselves as permanent residents, competition for political power could also become a problem. Baluch tribesmen, for example, fear that Pushtun refugees will join the large number of Pakistani Pushtuns in Baluchistan Province and seize political control.

If the refugees become a serious economic burden or if tensions between refugees and Pakistanis cause serious civil disorders, we believe Islamabad would be more amenable to an arrangement with Kabul and Moscow that facilitated the return of the refugees and ended Pakistani support for the resistance. Should many of the refugees nevertheless remain in

| <ul> <li>As is usually the case in tribal insurgencies, the rebellion was initially very successful. The local leaders quickly gained control of much of the rural area where the regime's security forces and administrative structures were rapidly eliminated.</li> <li>Government forces had neither sufficient discipline nor training to fight more than a few bands at a time. Conscripted soldiers displayed low morale and growing reluctance to fight their own Muslim countrymen on behalf of a Communist regime. By late 1979 resistance forces were poised to capture major urban areas.</li> </ul> | ·25X1 |
| A New Phase: Soviet Intervention  The Soviet invasion and the coup d'etat in Kabul led to a new phase in the insurgency.  As a result of more vigorous government and Soviet ground operations and frequent air strikes, some communities suffered considerable damage, and local institutions came under severe pressures.  |           |
| <ul> <li>Faced with persistent retaliation—especially airstrikes—and economic hardships, hundreds of thousands of Afghans fled to Pakistan or Iran.</li> <li>Some leaders responded to these pressures with informal accommodations and laissez—faire policies with the Communist forces.</li> </ul>   | 25X1      |
| A considerable number of tribesmen are determined to continue the fight, but they have trouble mounting a coherent threat to the regime.  Weaknesses in local leadership make it difficult to create a cohesive force or pursue sustained objectives.  Manpower usually cannot be spared from economic activities for long periods; some groups fear heavy casualties that would make it even more difficult to sustain agricultural production.   | •         |

| Towards a More Lethal Insurgency  |               |
| It now appears that the Afghan insurgents, under military pressures from the Soviet Union, are going through a transitional phase.  |               |
| — The destruction of local institutions in areas of intensemilitary pressure has resulted, in some cases, in the developmentof more modern rural insurgencies with nontribal organizationalfeatures.  |               |
| <ul> <li>In other areas, such as the Panjsher Valley, local leadersseem to have acceded to Westernized commanders who havedemonstrated military leadership.</li> </ul>  | 25 X 1 |

| Tribesmen who have elected to remain in Afghanistan and resist the government, however, are likely over time to become part of larger groups with more modern organizational structure. Overcoming longstanding ethnic rivalries will be difficult, but Masood's success in forging alliances in the northeast suggests that the task is not impossible. | 25X1             |
| Looking Ahead—Elusive Soviet Success   | •                |
| We believe that as nontribal, nonlocal insurgent organizations develop, the Soviets will find it more difficult either to reach an accommodation with individual insurgent groups or to destroy them. A key factor will be the effectiveness of the "new" insurgents in creating disciplined and coherent organizations.                                 |                  |
| — As the transition progresses, other key elements will be theability of new groups to retain and gain local sympathizers andcommitted supporters and to mobilize public opinion in oppositionto government programs and tactics.  |                  |
| — Key points for the government will be its ability to buildresponsive local political organizations, to avoid self—defeating punitive expeditions against rural populations, and todevelop better motivated armed forces from new and youngerrecruits.  | 25 X 1    |
