Soviet Activities in Selected
Middle East/African Countries
January 1, 1976 - July 1, 1976

The Soviet position in the Middle East took another turn for the worse during May and June. The Lebanese crisis rapidly evolved into the most pressing problem confronting Soviet objectives in the region. In early June, Premier Kosygin was greeted upon his arrival in Damascus with the news that Syrian troops had entered the Lebanese fray in force—on the side of the Christians. The spectacle of its allies, the Syrians and the Palestinians, battling each other with Soviet-supplied arms has clearly disturbed Moscow.

Soviet plans for using Syria and the Palestinians to isolate Egypt and thwart US step-by-step diplomacy have been disrupted by the Syrian-PLO conflict, and the USSR is fearful of the long-term implications of this situation. Recently Moscow has more openly supported the Palestinians. It has not only helped others get arms and ammunition to the hard-pressed Palestinian forces in Lebanon, but has also tried to persuade Syria to cease and desist in Lebanon.

There is some evidence that the Soviets have threatened to curtail or even end the military supply flow to Syria, but it is still not clear whether the Soviets have cut back, and it remains unlikely that Moscow would resort to more than a slowdown in arms shipments.

Kosygin also found the Baghdad leg of his most recent Middle East visit disheartening. Talks with the Iraqis were occasionally heated, and although a new, substantial arms agreement was apparently reached, serious problems remain unresolved. Syrian-Iraqi tensions, always present, grew worse as Syrian involvement in Lebanon deepened. The Iraqis moved large numbers of troops toward the Syrian border, increasing the danger of hostilities between Iraq and Syria.

Soviet-Egyptian relations remain strained, although Cairo has indicated it hopes for improvement. The Soviets, biding their time, have yet to react decisively to these overtures and may be awaiting more concrete gestures, knowing that the Egyptian military needs spare parts badly.

Soviet relations with Morocco have deteriorated, even though Moscow has not overtly sided with Algeria in the Spanish Sahara dispute. The dispute between Somalia and Ethiopia over the FTAI has thus far produced no clear strains in Moscow's relations with either Mogadiscio or Addis Ababa. Soviet influence in Aden and Sana may be threatened if Saudi Arabia's efforts to improve relations with both countries make headway. There have been recurring reports of an impending arms deal between the USSR and Kuwait. These reports are unconfirmed, occasionally contradictory, but persistent.
