SUBJECT: Controlling Travel of Hostile Nationals in UN Secretariat

Ambassador Kirkpatrick called March 11 p.m. to convey the following views concerning the possibility of US action to restrict/control the travel of hostile nationals in the UN Secretariat. (She said these views were developed in a discussion earlier the same day with Ambassador Lichenstein.)

-- It is clear that the US should try to avoid presenting the UN Secretary General/Secretariat with any statements of general principle or policies of general applicability, i.e., applying to the nationals of all hostile nationals employed by the Secretariat.

-- Ambassador Kirkpatrick would propose to have a conversation with the Secretary General to advise him of our serious and continuing security concerns which stem from the presence and activities of hostile foreign nationals in the UN Secretariat.

-- With these concerns in mind, she would advise the Secretary General, the US must reserve the right to restrict/control the travel of hostile foreign nationals employed by the Secretariat.

-- Ambassador Kirkpatrick might well have further comments/recommendations following this conversation with the Secretary General; a conversation she would want to conduct personally.

-- There would, however, be no statement in advance that it is US policy to restrict/control the travel of nationals from a given set of countries or even all nationals of a particular country.

-- Rather, the US would decide on a case-by-case basis (taking into account all available intelligence as well as general UN and foreign policy concerns) whether/how to control travel by hostile nationals employed in the Secretariat.
