

Page Denied

Next 1 Page(s) In Document Denied

Directorate of Intelligence

Secret

25X1

MASTER FILE COPY
DO NOT GIVE OUT DO MARK ON

The Cuban-Soviet Connection: Costs, Benefits, and Directions

25X1

An Intelligence Assessment

PROJECT NUMBER JT * 0239 * 86
 W M J K
 PAGE NUMBERS 35 (N)
 TOTAL NUMBER OF COPIES 460
 DISSEM DATE 86/05/08
 EXTRA COPIES ~~349-380~~ 349-380 0010
 RECORD CENTER 381-430
 JOB NUMBER 425-536 ~~FOUO~~

Secret

ALA 86-10017
SOV 86-10020
April 1986

Copy 347

Page Denied

Directorate of Intelligence

Secret

25X1

The Cuban-Soviet Connection: Costs, Benefits, and Directions

25X1

An Intelligence Assessment

This paper was prepared by Office of African and Latin American Analysis, and Office of Soviet Analysis. It was coordinated with the Directorate of Operations.

25X1

25X1

25X1

Comments and queries are welcome and may be directed to the Chief, Middle America-Caribbean Division, ALA,

25X1

Secret

*ALA 86-10017
SOV 86-10020
April 1986*

Declassified in Part - Sanitized Copy Approved for Release 2011/12/13 : CIA-RDP88T00768R000200170001-6

Declassified in Part - Sanitized Copy Approved for Release 2011/12/13 : CIA-RDP88T00768R000200170001-6

Secret

25X1

The Cuban-Soviet Connection: Costs, Benefits, and Directions

25X1

Key Judgments*Information available
as of 14 April 1986 was used in this report.*

The longevity and breadth of Soviet-Cuban ties—political, economic, and military—make their relationship, in our opinion, the strongest and most important of the USSR's links to its Third World allies. Despite the expressions of harmony at their respective Communist Party congresses earlier this year, however, relations between Havana and Moscow continue to be marred by frictions arising from differing foreign policy priorities and Cuba's poor economic performance. Strains in the relationship over the last two years represent a low point in a longstanding cycle of alternating discord and harmony dating back to the 1960s.

25X1

The Soviets are pressing for policy changes in Cuba on both economic and political issues. Castro, because of Cuba's overwhelming economic dependence on the USSR, is less able to deflect Moscow's demands than at any time since the late 1960s. This growing economic dependence and Castro's consequential adherence to Soviet policy will undercut any pretension of Cuba's nonaligned status and negate Havana's claim that the USSR is the "natural ally" of developing countries—all of which create opportunities for the United States to gain some political and propaganda advantage.

25X1

The complex patron-client relationship is based on a broad spectrum of reinforcing linkages that provide mutual benefits. Soviet economic assistance to Cuba, for example, has averaged $4.5 billion annually since 1980, and is by far the most extensive Soviet aid program to any developing country. It is the military component of this relationship, however, that is most valued by Moscow:

- Soviet military aid, provided free of cost to Havana, amounts to more than $500 million per year and has transformed the Cuban military into one of the largest and best equipped forces in the Third World.
- The USSR maintains a military presence in Cuba of an estimated 8,000 troops, military advisers, and intelligence personnel, while utilizing Cuban airfields and ports to project its military power into the Caribbean. The Soviet SIGINT intercept facility at Lourdes, Cuba, remains the Kremlin's largest intelligence collection site of its kind outside the Soviet Union and appreciably increases Moscow's collection capability against the United States.

Secret

ALA 86-10017
SOV 86-10020
April 1986

Secret

25X1

- Soviet military and economic aid to Cuba has enabled Castro to remain a major political and military actor in developing areas and to deploy an estimated 45,000 Cuban military personnel in the Third World in pursuit of Havana's—and Moscow's—revolutionary goals.

25X1

The current friction between the two states stems from a perception in both Moscow and Havana that the relative cost of the overall relationship has increased, although neither questions its worth. From the Soviet perspective, the cost of Moscow's economic subsidy to Cuba has jumped dramatically at the same time that opportunities for joint military intervention abroad have diminished and Castro has no new "victories over imperialism" to tout to Soviet leaders. In Cuba's view, its influence in the Third World suffers as Moscow's demands and Havana's subservience become increasingly obvious.

25X1

Our analysis suggests that Moscow's pressure on Havana will continue to increase. We expect the Soviets to seek greater influence over internal Cuban decisionmaking, particularly in the economic realm, as well as even greater Cuban subservience to Soviet foreign policy. There is likely to be a period of sustained tension over the next several years as Castro makes grudging adjustments to manage and deflect Soviet pressures that will affect fundamental aspects of his handling of state affairs as well as his economic policies.

25X1

The most contentious issue, in our view, will be bilateral economic relations, including the level of Soviet aid and Cuba's management of its domestic economy. We believe the new Gorbachev team in the USSR is likely to:

- Slow the increase of Soviet economic aid to Cuba.
- Seek to assume greater control over and accountability for Havana's use of Soviet economic assistance.
- Increase Moscow's direction of Cuban economic investment and development.
- Increase pressure on Castro to reduce Cuban bureaucratic inefficiency and mismanagement.

25X1

We believe these frictions will stop short, however, of causing any fundamental shift in the relationship because Castro recognizes that there are no alternatives to the massive Soviet aid that keeps his regime afloat. Still, he is likely to resist Soviet moves that he perceives as a challenge to

Secret

Secret

25X1

Cuban sovereignty and his personal authority. While in most cases his resistance is unlikely to be confrontational, we believe Castro will at times continue to use public diplomacy to signal his displeasure with Moscow as he did at the Soviet Party Congress in February. More often, he will use foot-dragging, delaying tactics, and the establishment of informal bureaucratic groups directly subordinate to himself to retain his policy prerogatives. []

25X1

We believe that the Soviets—although increasingly intent on reducing the burden of supporting the Cuban economy—are unlikely to make deep cuts in aid to Cuba that could erode the regime's popular support. Moscow almost certainly views Castro as one of its most stable and reliable allies, and, in light of the continuing high levels of Soviet military aid to Cuba, apparently continues to value highly Havana's ability to advance mutual foreign policy objectives in the Third World. []

25X1

Even if relations remain essentially unchanged, as we expect, Cuba's bleak economic outlook and still-deepening dependence on the Soviet Union are likely to have further implications on the conduct of Cuban foreign policy. We have little doubt, for example, that Castro will continue to demonstrate unswerving loyalty to Moscow's foreign policy line in international organizations, even at the expense of his own image. Moreover, Castro will have to coordinate even more closely his own international initiatives with Moscow, and is likely to work even harder on the Kremlin's behalf to justify his requests for increased aid and to deflect Soviet pressures on him for domestic policy changes. In our opinion, the Cuban leader will be hard pressed to refuse a Soviet request to send military personnel to an endangered pro-Moscow regime in the Third World. []

25X1

Judging from their public statements [] we believe that Moscow and Havana have settled most of their disagreements on Third World policy. Although the rising costs of joint Soviet-Cuban involvement in the Third World, as well as foreign policy setbacks such as Grenada, have been a source of friction between Moscow and Havana over the last five years, both now seem to be trying to ensure that their actions more closely complement one another. They seem to be striving in particular to avoid working at cross-purposes in key client states such as Angola and Nicaragua, where continued support and a coordination of efforts are essential to avoid disastrous foreign policy setbacks.

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

25X1

We cannot rule out the possibility—although we consider it remote—that a sharp deterioration in Cuban-Soviet relations could occur over serious policy differences regarding Nicaragua or perhaps Angola. For Castro, the Marxist Sandinista regime is his only ally in the hemisphere and represents his only success in 26 years of fomenting armed revolution in Latin America. As a result, we believe Castro would go further in acting independently of Moscow to protect the Nicaraguan Government than he would on any other foreign policy issue. In Angola, increasing Cuban concern over rising casualties and the consequent unrest in Cuba could make Castro more resistant to Soviet pressure to enlarge the Cuban combat role.

25X1

Secret

Secret

25X1

Contents

	Page
Key Judgments	iii
Introduction	1
The Special Relationship: Havana's Perspective	1
Benefits	1
Costs	4
The Special Relationship: The View From Moscow	7
Benefits	7
Costs	8
A History of Controlled Stress	10
Tension Over Aid Levels	11
Foreign Policy Frictions	12
Bending to Moscow's Will	12
Dealing With Policy Differences	13
Lingering Problems	15
Outlook and Implications for the United States	16
 Appendixes
A. Longstanding Military Ties	19
B. Cycles of Strains	25

Secret

25X1

Figure 1

707549 (B00125) 4-86

Boundary representation is not necessarily authoritative.

25X1

Secret

viii

Secret
[redacted]

25X1

The Cuban-Soviet Connection:
Costs, Benefits, and Directions [redacted]

25X1

Introduction

The Cuban-Soviet relationship has developed over time into the strongest and most important of Moscow's ties to its Third World clients. Their joint interventions in Africa during the mid-1970s transformed Cuba from a relatively minor player to the role of key Soviet surrogate and greatly expanded the Soviet projection of power into that region. Currently, the established network of political, economic, social, and particularly military ties continues to enhance the capabilities of both countries and increase opportunities for them to pursue their respective and mutual foreign policy interests. Nonetheless, the Cubans and Soviets have experienced periods of serious strain in the past, and, over the last two years or so, visible signs of discord have surfaced again. [redacted] global scale and as Washington has increasingly focused on Havana's proxy actions in the Western Hemisphere, Moscow has sought—and gained—greater influence over Cuba's decisionmaking apparatus. [redacted]

25X1

Benefits

The Castro regime has received considerable economic and military aid from the USSR, particularly since 1980. We estimate that over the last five years Soviet economic assistance has risen to approximately $4.5 billion annually—by far the highest amount Moscow spends on any Third World client. Overall, this assistance—comprising trade subsidies and development aid—has mounted to the equivalent of some $40 billion since the first bilateral economic agreement was signed in 1960.¹ Cuban statistics show that Havana now depends on the Soviet Union for about 70 percent of its total trade, with Moscow subsidizing that commerce by paying artificially high prices for Cuban products while pricing its exports to Cuba below world market levels. We estimate, for example, that Moscow pays at least five, and perhaps as much as 10 times the world market price for Cuban sugar. Moreover, during the early 1980s, Cuba paid only about 50 percent of the OPEC price for Soviet crude petroleum and petroleum products, which amount to about 90 percent of Havana's needs and constitute the most critical element of Cuba's dependency. The Soviet Union also supplies most of Cuba's industrial, agricultural, and transport equipment. [redacted]

25X1

This paper evaluates the costs and benefits of the relationship as viewed from the Cuban and Soviet perspectives. The paper also reassesses the relationship in light of recent bilateral frictions, their foreign policy setbacks over the past two years, and the new Gorbachev leadership in the Kremlin. This study also estimates the prospects for Cuban-Soviet relations during the last half of this decade, explores the potential vulnerabilities in their relationship, and considers the implications for the United States. [redacted]

25X1

The Special Relationship: Havana's Perspective

Over the years, the mutually reinforcing linkages between Havana and Moscow—spanning the economic, military, and ideological spheres—have uniformly broadened and deepened. Economic guarantees, a continuing high level of free Soviet military aid, and close Communist Party ties illustrate the Castro regime's special status among the USSR's Third World clients. As the tally sheet of benefits has risen for Havana, however, so have the costs associated with being a unique Soviet ally. As Cuba has become an increasingly important Soviet military partner on a

Moscow also provides Cuba—both directly and through Cuba's participation in the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CEMA)—materials, equipment, and advisers for projects relating to export development, import substitution, and infrastructure improvements. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

¹ All Soviet aid figures are in nominal terms and are not adjusted for inflation. [redacted]

25X1

Page Denied

Secret

Table 1
Estimated Soviet Economic Assistance to Cuba, 1976-84

Million US $

	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Total	1,569	2,270	2,946	3,178	3,463	4,555	4,666	4,260	4,620
Economic aid	185	230	320	460	830	1,415	975	1,070	1,000
Trade ^a					245	912	481	500	460
Development aid ^a	150	195	285	420	540	453	444	520	490
Technical services	35	35	35	40	45	50	50	50	50
Trade subsidies	1,384	2,040	2,626	2,718	2,633	3,140	3,691	3,190	3,620
Sugar ^b	989	1,638	2,427	2,324	1,165	1,365	2,580	2,740	3,420
Petroleum ^c	374	378	164	381	1,480	1,655	1,006	345	100
Nickel ^b	21	24	35	13	-12	120	105	105	100

^a Based on estimated balance-of-payments aid necessary to cover Cuban soft currency trade deficits with the USSR, Cuban purchases of capital goods from Moscow, and public statements by Cuban and Soviet officials concerning the amount of development aid extended. This aid is repayable, but terms are highly concessional.

^b Sugar and nickel subsidies are estimated as the difference between the price Moscow pays for these commodities and their world market value. The difference is considered as a grant.

^c The petroleum subsidy reflects the difference between the value of the petroleum purchased from the USSR and the value of these imports at world market prices. It is considered a grant.

[Redacted]

25X1

[Redacted]

25X1

Cuban facilities built or modernized with Soviet aid since Castro took over in 1959 account for nearly 45 percent of electric power, 95 percent of steel production, 100 percent of sheet metal output, 60 percent of textile manufacturing, and 20 percent of raw sugar processing. [Redacted] refinery being constructed with Soviet assistance at Cienfuegos. Several thousand Soviet economic advisers on the island oversee these projects, and often directly meddle in the day-to-day operation of the Cuban economy. [Redacted]

25X1

Cuba also has benefited over the years from Soviet military aid.² [Redacted]

25X1
25X1

Major joint projects initiated during the 1981-85 Five-Year Plan include, according to press reporting, Cuba's first nuclear power generating station at Cienfuegos, which will save Havana 28 percent of its Soviet petroleum imports, and a major nickel processing plant at Punta Gorda near Moa. Together with another nickel plant now in the early stages of construction, Cuba's nickel export capability will triple. Other joint projects currently under way include a supertanker port east of Havana and a new oil

[Redacted] Moscow does not charge Havana for the weapon systems and military-associated equipment it provides the Cuban Revolutionary Armed Forces. Moreover, [Redacted] indicate that the volume of this aid has increased recently. During 1980-84, the annual

25X1

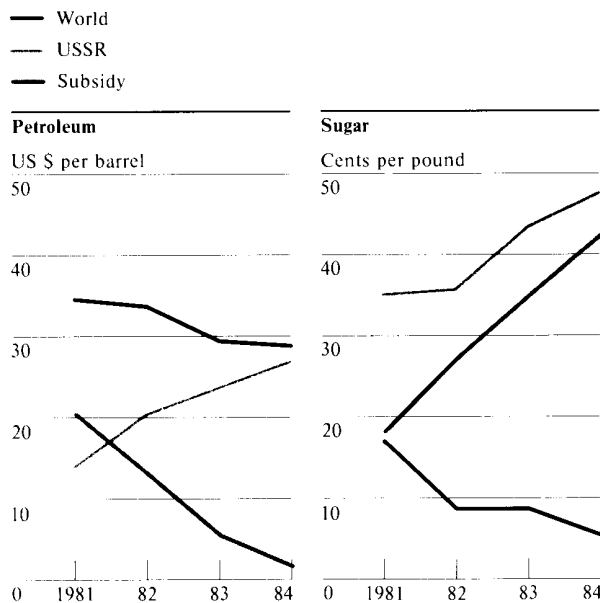

25X1

² See appendix A for a more detailed description of Cuban-Soviet military ties. [Redacted]

25X1

Secret

Figure 2
Cuba: Soviet Subsidized Versus World Market Prices for Cuban Sugar Exports and Petroleum Imports, 1981-84 flow of Soviet arms and military-associated equipment to Cuba has been larger than during any year since the missile crisis of 1962.

308789 4-86

The successful Cuban-Soviet teamwork in their Third World interventions has brought Castro considerable international prestige, and has facilitated Cuba's efforts to expand its overseas presence (see foldout map and table 3 at back for a detailed look at Soviet and Cuban expansion into the Third World from 1975 to 1984). Although some moderate Third World leaders have expressed wariness over Soviet and Cuban "internationalism," many others view their role as benevolent, useful, and generous. Reflecting Havana's success, Cuban civilian assistance programs grew from some 1,800 economic advisers in the Third World in 1975 to some 20,000 civilian personnel abroad by 1980. This included large contingents in Ethiopia, Angola, Nicaragua, and Mozambique, as well as smaller groups in some 28 other countries. In addition, Cuba has become a major host for Third World students—some 26,000 from 75 countries have studied in Cuba over the past decade.

Costs

Despite these positive aspects, the Castro regime recognizes that there is a price associated with its close ties to the Soviets. As Cuba's dependence on Moscow increases, Havana's image among Third World nations tends to suffer. For example, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan spoiled Castro's concurrent chairmanship of the Nonaligned Movement and caused Cuba to lose its bid for a seat on the UN Security Council. Similarly, the dutiful backing Havana gave Moscow following the shooting down of the KAL airliner and the Soviet boycott of the 1984 Olympics undercut Castro's pretensions of independence.

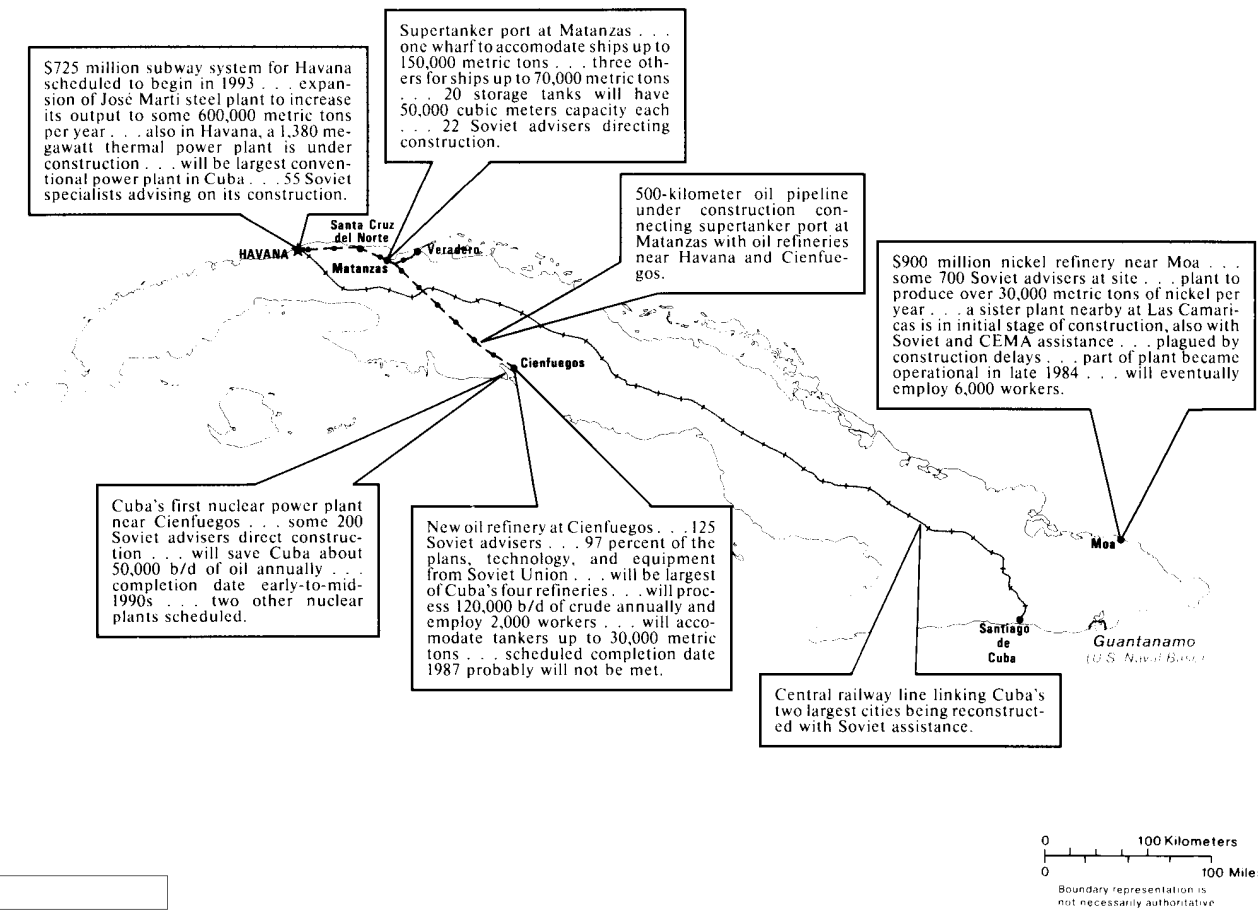

Castro's decision in the 1960s to align Cuba with the USSR has not accomplished the Cuban leader's objectives for economic independence or progress. In 1958, for example, 70 percent of Cuba's trade was with the United States; today the USSR accounts for about the same portion. Investment, once supplied primarily by private US residents, now comes mostly from the USSR. In addition, the several thousand Soviet advisers now in Cuba have a far greater influence on the island's economic management than did US investors or the US Government in the 1950s. Cuba's weakened economic position, however, is most evident in its need for direct aid: whereas US economic assistance to Cuba in 1958 was equivalent to less than 1 percent of Cuba's national output, Soviet economic aid in 1985—estimated at some $4.5 billion—corresponded to somewhat more than 30 percent of Cuba's real output. Without this aid, Havana would be hard pressed to meet even basic consumption and investment needs.

Secret

4

Secret

Figure 3
Soviet-Sponsored Economic Development Projects in Cuba

25X1

Secret

Secret

Figure 4. The new Soviet Embassy complex in Havana, jokingly referred to by some Cubans as the "control tower" or "the Kremlin," was inaugurated last year after long construction delays. Initiated in 1978, the complex occupies four city blocks and is comparable in size to the new Soviet Embassy under construction in Washington, D.C. The complex is intended to house the entire Soviet Embassy staff and dependents and contains a multistory office building, a large auditorium, apartment buildings, and a swimming pool. The buildings were constructed by Cuban workers with Soviet advisers, except for the top levels of the Embassy office building that are suspected of housing sophisticated communications equipment.

In economic matters generally, the Cuban leader is finding himself under increasing pressure from the USSR to adopt Soviet-style planning, to implement the advice of Moscow's advisers stationed in Cuba, and to integrate Cuba more fully into CEMA.

[Redacted]

25X1

[Redacted] These Soviet moves seriously jeopardize Castro's longtime goal of industrializing the island and diversifying the economy, and making Cuba a showcase of socialist Third World development. He probably fears that Moscow's emphasis on primary sector development will condemn Cuba to being solely a sugar exporter, indefinitely dependent on the Soviet Union.

25X1

Castro continues to try to justify his requests to Moscow for increased aid by reminding the Soviets of his usefulness to them in the Third World.

25X1

25X1

25X1

[Redacted]

[Redacted] Castro has had no new "victories" in the Third World to herald in recent years, however, and, in our judgment, the Cuban leader's ability to deflect Moscow's pressures is at its lowest point since 1967.

25X1

25X1

25X1

[Redacted]

Moreover, despite record levels of Soviet economic aid in recent years, Cuban economic productivity and performance have not been improving, and Castro, because of low world sugar prices and falling oil prices, has little near-term prospect of showing Moscow any significant growth in the Cuban economy.

25X1

[Redacted]

25X1

[Redacted]

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

The Special Relationship: The View From Moscow

Benefits

The USSR derives a wide range of political and military advantages from its ties to Cuba. Since the early 1960s, Cuba has provided the USSR with a significant presence in the Caribbean Basin, an area of strategic importance to the United States. The largest Soviet signals intelligence collection facility outside the USSR is located at Lourdes, about 15 kilometers southwest of Havana. This installation intercepts US domestic and international satellite communications, tracks and collects data on US missiles launched from Cape Canaveral, [redacted]

Cuban airfields are also extensively utilized by the Soviets, such as for the deployment of TU-95 Bear reconnaissance aircraft. These deployments tend to last from two to four weeks and are staged to collect intelligence on US naval operations or engage in antisubmarine warfare operations off the US east coast. The Soviet Navy also uses Cuba as a support base for its periodic visits to the Caribbean Basin. In addition, Soviet Bear flights to Angola stage through Havana en route to Africa. [redacted]

The Soviet-Cuban joint interventions in Angola and Ethiopia transformed Cuba from an essentially passive recipient of military largess into an active and valuable military ally of the Soviet Union. The use of Cuban troops avoided the negative repercussions that most likely would have been caused by the intervention of Soviet military forces. Not only did the Castro regime play a key role in consolidating the power of two Marxist regimes, but the resulting increase in Cuba's international influence also made the Castro regime an increasingly effective defender of Soviet interests in Third World forums. For example, Havana was able by the late 1970s to eliminate the concept of "two imperialisms" (the United States and the Soviet Union) from the Nonaligned Movement and to focus the hostility of the organization more directly on Washington. [redacted]

Figure 5. Cuban-manned, Soviet-made PT-76 light amphibious tank in downtown Luanda in 1976 during heyday of Cuba's involvement in Angola. Since the late 1970s, however, Moscow's and Havana's liabilities—material and human—associated with keeping the dos Santos regime in power have increased steadily. Although stingy with economic assistance (see figure 7), Moscow's military aid to Angola increased every year from 1979 to 1984. The 36,000 Cuban military personnel in Angola are still needed to man air defense missile and radar sites, and service and fly the Soviet MIG-21 fighters and Hind MI-24 attack helicopters. Although they have avoided frontline combat so far, Cuban troops could become more involved in counterinsurgency operations over the next few years despite Castro's sensitivity to increasing casualties. [redacted]

Cuba, in pursuing its anti-US foreign policy objectives, has also assisted Soviet interests in the Western Hemisphere. The most successful example is Nicaragua, where [redacted] early on in the revolution Cuba helped design the military strategy of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), provided an estimated 500 metric tons of weaponry to the guerrillas, trained and transported combatants to join the battle, and later sent as many as 50 advisers to accompany the Sandinista units. These actions helped propel the Sandinistas to power in 1979 at a low cost both to the Cubans and Soviets. Moscow enjoyed the fruits of all these victories, keeping its involvement restricted essentially to the provision of military equipment and logistic support to the Cubans. [redacted]

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1
25X1

Secret

Secret

Figure 6. Cuban artillery unit in the Ogaden campaign in Ethiopia in 1978, part of Cuba's 17,000-man troop deployment to roll back Somalia's military invasion. Havana has drawn down its military personnel to some 5,500 troops and advisers. Castro has refused to assist Ethiopian counterinsurgency operations against the northern guerrilla movements, one of which—the Eritreans—was supported by Cuba prior to Mengistu's rise to power. The remaining Cuban personnel have little to do except advise, man garrisons, and repair equipment, and [redacted] Cuban troop morale is low.

Cuba has continued to serve as a middleman for Soviet interests in Nicaragua. [redacted] Cuba has served as a transfer point for Soviet military equipment destined for the Sandinista regime, thereby enabling Moscow to provide such material discreetly. Similarly, the Cuban role in supporting the Salvadoran guerrillas and other insurgent groups in Latin America permits Moscow to maintain a low profile in the region. By avoiding direct involvement in such cases, Soviet flexibility is enhanced; Moscow can alter its level of support to such groups or revise its policy without risking a loss of face. [redacted]

Costs

The euphoria of the victories in Angola, Ethiopia, and Nicaragua began to wear off by the beginning of the 1980s, as the focus of Moscow's and Havana's efforts necessarily shifted from helping insurgent groups attain power to the more difficult process of consolidating regimes in power. The Soviets and Cubans were now confronted by their clients' problems such as deepening economic malaise, growing insurgent activity, rising popular discontent, and leadership factionalism. Moreover, no new easy opportunities have arisen over the last few years as the Soviets and Cubans found themselves increasingly challenged by Washington. [redacted]

25X1

As troubles mount for Soviet-Cuban allies in the Third World, so do Moscow's associated costs. For example, Moscow had to increase its military aid to the dos Santos government in Angola between 1979 and 1984. Soviet military deliveries to Ethiopia in 1983 and 1984 doubled the level of the previous two years, and, in Mozambique, Soviet military aid since 1975 is now approaching $1 billion. [redacted]

25X1

The Soviets, moreover, have broader Third World concerns and are bearing other major burdens in the developing areas. In addition to its major involvements in Angola, Ethiopia, and Nicaragua, [redacted] Moscow is maintaining some 115,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan, conducting a war that has dragged on since 1979. In addition, the Kremlin is supporting the Vietnamese regime with more than $1 billion a year in economic aid and is providing the military materiel necessary to sustain Hanoi's counterinsurgency effort in Cambodia. Some of these clients can do little more for the Soviets than survive, and potentially could represent serious setbacks for Moscow if they were toppled over the next few years. [redacted]

25X1
25X1

25X1
25X1
25X1

25X1
25X1

The Soviets apparently also are concerned over the increasing cost of their Cuban aid programs, judging from the sharp tenor of Soviet complaints about Havana's economic mismanagement. Compared to the mid-1970s when sugar prices were high and Cuban economic performance was good, the island's

25X1

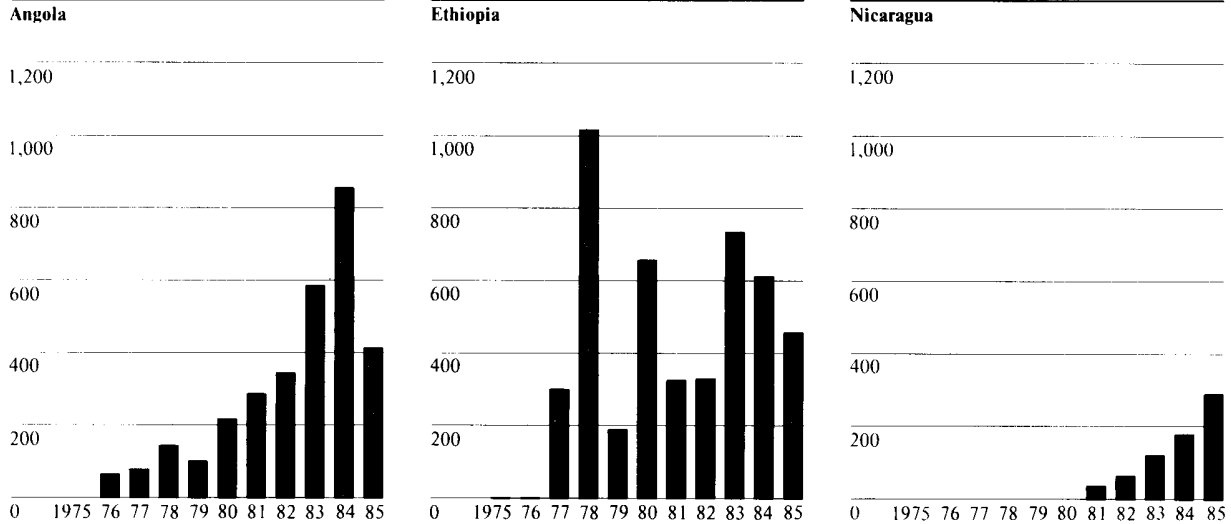

Secret

Secret

Figure 7
Soviet Military and Economic Aid to Angola, Ethiopia, and Nicaragua, 1975-85

Million US $

■ Economic aid
 ■ Military aid

308790 4-86

25X1

economy is now stagnating and the Soviet subsidy is burgeoning. On the basis of our estimates, annual Soviet assistance to Cuba amounts to more than half of Moscow's total assistance to its Third World clients. [redacted]

[redacted]

25X1

25X1

Moscow seems to be particularly unhappy with what it views as Cuban inefficiency and economic mismanagement. [redacted] Moscow has frequently criticized the Cubans for failing to meet trade and delivery commitments to the Soviet Union and other CEMA partners. [redacted]

The Soviets seem to be increasingly worried over the poor international image of the Cuban economy. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

Soviet specialists have sharply condemned Cuba's 20-year-old food rationing system as a poor example for the rest of Latin America, especially since food can be grown year round on the island and land capacity is more than sufficient for a population of 10 million. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

Figure 8
Soviet Economic Aid Per Capita for the USSR's Major Recipients, 1984^a

^a Data include trade subsidies.

308791 4-86

Figure 9
Soviet Economic Aid to Communist and Non-Communist LDCs, 1984^a

^a Data include trade subsidies.

308792 4-86

25X1

A History of Controlled Stress

Such unhappiness at both ends of the Havana-Moscow axis is not new to the relationship. A variety of academic studies [redacted] shows that relations between Cuba and the USSR have been characterized over the years by periods of sharp disagreement. The first such dispute was sparked by the missile crisis in 1962 when Moscow agreed to remove the missiles and bombers without consulting Fidel Castro. Over the next decade, public statements by the two nations underscored bitter disagreement over revolutionary strategy and economic theory.⁴ Finally, the death of Che Guevara in 1967 and the debacle of the drive to produce 10 million tons of sugar in 1970 marked the end of the Cuban leader's gamble that a combination of spectacular economic achievements and guerrilla victories in Latin America would enable him to fend off domination by the Soviet Union. With the economy in shambles and armed struggle discredited, Castro had no choice but to accept the conditions of survival offered by Moscow—basic conformity with Soviet principles in economics, ideology, political organization, and foreign policy. [redacted]

⁴ For a more detailed chronology of the cycle of tensions in the Soviet-Cuban relationship, see appendix B. [redacted]

The effects of Soviet pressure and Cuba's diminishing independence were reflected in:

- The establishment of a joint commission in 1970 that became an instrument for strong Soviet influence over Cuban economic policy formulation.
- Cuba's accession in 1972 to full membership in CEMA.
- The total reorganization in 1972 of the Cuban Government apparatus on the Soviet model.
- A reduced emphasis on armed struggle in Cuban foreign policy.
- A complete reorganization in 1973 of Cuba's mass organizations along Soviet lines.

25X1
25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

- The convening in 1975 of the long-postponed first congress of the Cuban Communist Party and a reorientation of the party's role to correspond with the Soviet and East European models.
- The adoption in 1976 of a new constitution, which conformed to the letter and spirit of the Soviet constitutions. [redacted]

Nevertheless, Castro apparently did not accede to all Soviet demands. [redacted]

[redacted] for example, in 1975 Moscow pressed Castro to hand over the party leadership position to his brother Raul at the first party congress. The Soviets, [redacted] [redacted] wanted Fidel to concentrate on being a Third World spokesman and focus more on ceremonial duties. Contrary to Moscow's wishes, however, the Cuban leader used the congress and the corresponding governmental reorganization to reaffirm his personal hold on all the top party, government, and military posts. [redacted]

Tension Over Aid Levels

[redacted] frictions have been rising during the past two years over economic issues. In our judgment, Havana and Moscow have been at odds over the fundamental development strategy assigned to Cuba within CEMA, as well as Cuba's own economic inefficiency. Moscow also seems to be attempting to reduce the burden of supporting the Cuban economy, and its efforts on these subjects are not being well received in Havana. For example, an East European diplomat told the US Interests Section in Havana that, during the planning talks for the June 1984 CEMA summit in Moscow, Cuba sought to adjust its economic role within the organization to emphasize accelerated industrial development. The Cubans evidently were rebuffed because published summit documents noted that Cuba will continue instead to focus on agriculture—a role analogous to that of a primary goods producer for a colonial power. Castro stayed away from the heads of state summit—the only leader to do so—probably to avoid being associated with humiliating resolutions that underscored Cuba's dependency and client status. [redacted]

Cuba apparently tried to raise the issue again at the CEMA prime minister's meeting held in Havana during October 1984. At a press conference one week before the gathering, Cuban Vice President Carlos Rafael Rodriguez said that Cuba did not want to produce only agricultural products or consumer goods, but also wanted to develop the "means of production." He cited electronics and genetic engineering as the kinds of industries Cuba hopes to develop. In his speech to the assembled CEMA premiers at the opening session, Castro pointedly noted Cuba's disappointment over its "modest" participation as an exporter in the electronics and machine industries within CEMA. He reiterated Cuba's interest in expanding its participation in industrial fields. [redacted]

Soviet economic officials apparently were unmoved by Castro's pleas. The 15-year cooperation agreement that Castro and then Soviet Premier Tikhonov signed at the close of the CEMA meeting listed agriculture, minerals, fuel, and energy industries as the main areas of Soviet aid to Cuba. The agreement signifies to us that the focus of Moscow's assistance for Cuban development for the rest of the century will remain restricted to energy development, petroleum refining, nickel mining and processing, and modernization of the sugar industry. [redacted]

Moreover, the Soviets indicated at the Havana meeting that future Soviet aid will be leveled off at 1984-85 amounts. For example, [redacted] [redacted] the amount of oil that the Soviets have agreed to supply over the next five years is about the same as the amount provided during the last five-year plan. The TASS Bureau Chief in Havana told US Interests Section officials last year that the Soviet problem with Cuba was that Castro simply did not believe that Moscow would ever decrease its assistance. In our view, the Soviet official was saying, in effect, that Castro had been calling Moscow's bluff by ignoring warnings about reducing his stipend, and, in order to restore the USSR's credibility and control over its investment in Cuba, Soviet officials need to back up their tough talk with aid restrictions. [redacted]

The Soviets may have relented somewhat on their tough line because of last year's hurricane and drought damage to Cuba's sugar crop, the fall of oil prices that will substantially reduce Havana's earnings from the reexport of Soviet oil, and Castro's

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

recent efforts to improve Cuban economic performance. According to press reports, Soviet-Cuban economic agreements for the next five years signed in Havana in early April 1986, call for $3 billion in Soviet development credits during the 1986-90 period, an increase of about 50 percent over 1981-85 figures. It remains unclear whether these new credits represent an overall increase of Soviet economic assistance to Cuba because Soviet development credits generally have accounted for only about 10 percent of the total Soviet aid package.⁵ Moscow may have made other concessions to Cuba, but Castro's silence on the value of Soviet trade subsidies or on the future of the oil agreement that allows Cuba to sell the Soviet oil it conserves more likely indicates that agreement on these issues was not as advantageous to Cuba.

Foreign Policy Frictions

Tensions between Havana and Moscow also have arisen during the past few years over their differing foreign policy priorities, the unequal burdens shared in their Third World interventions, and differing perceptions in the two countries of the commitment the other side should be willing to bear. For example, public speeches by Castro indicate that Havana believes it is suffering increasing combat casualties, that the Soviets should extend more economic aid to Third World clients, and that the USSR should react more strongly to such US moves as the US intervention in Grenada.

Other disputes have surfaced over the pursuit of parochial interests in particular countries, especially where both Moscow and Havana have established contacts and seek to promote their respective allies as the dominant group at the expense of others. These problems generally only complicate their efforts to strengthen the left, although under certain situations—such as in Grenada—they can create conditions resulting in a more fundamental foreign policy setback for both the Soviets and the Cubans.

⁵ Soviet development credits to Cuba amounted to approximately $490 million in 1984, less than 11 percent of the total Soviet economic assistance that includes large trade subsidies. Soviet trade subsidies on sugar, petroleum, and nickel, for example, amounted to over $3.6 billion in 1984. A significant cut in the level of subsidies over the next five years, particularly in the price of sugar, could offset the impact of the new credits.

Moscow and Havana have worked at cross-purposes in a number of other cases, although none of their recent differences approach the gravity of the Grenada episode.

Bending to Moscow's Will

Recognizing that continuation of present aid levels requires him to accommodate Soviet demands, the Cuban leader—while still bargaining and arguing with Moscow—is moving to address a number of Soviet complaints. One month after signing a long-term Cuban-Soviet protocol on economic cooperation in late 1984, Castro declared a “profound economic revolution,” that is, a nationwide effort against waste and inefficiency.⁶ In a major speech, the Cuban leader announced that Cuba would face economic hardships until at least the next century. The thrust of Cuba's new economic policy—increasing exports to the West, meeting trade commitments to Communist countries, and limiting imports of consumer goods—suggests that Castro is responding seriously to Moscow's strictures on the need to save foreign exchange and its implicit warnings about future levels of assistance.

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1
25X1
25X1

25X1

Secret

The Grenada Fiasco

The US intervention in Grenada and the lack of Soviet response to this action led, in our view, to the most significant policy dispute between Moscow and Havana since the late 1960s. For the first time in a decade, the Cuban and Soviet claim of a shift in the correlation of forces in socialism's favor was called into question. For Fidel Castro, the Grenadian episode almost certainly heightened his sense of vulnerability, demonstrated Moscow's unwillingness to engage Washington in a serious confrontation in the Caribbean Basin, and proved to him that he must be careful not to provoke a similar US action in Central America. The Cuban leader's subsequent war hysteria campaign, the rapid expansion of Cuba's Territorial Militia to some 1.3 million people, and his emphasis on preparing the population for a prolonged "people's war" in the event of a US invasion demonstrated his recognition that Moscow would not come to Cuba's defense even in the event of hostilities with Washington.

What seemed to grate Castro even more was his apparent belief that Moscow was partially to blame for the bloody dissolution of the Grenadian revolution. In his speech at the funeral of the Cubans killed in Grenada, Castro placed the blame squarely on pro-Soviet Grenadian Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard, arguing that his actions set in motion the events that gave the United States a pretext to intervene. Conversely, the official Soviet line, elaborated in a TASS commentary, placed blame for the Grenadian episode on the United States, whose "special services" were alleged to have penetrated Grenadian circles and created the conditions for the US intervention. The TASS replay of the Castro speech pointedly omitted the paragraphs that described Coard's culpability, while Cuba has never adopted the Soviet line alleging US intelligence involvement.

Castro also is responding to economic problems and bureaucratic inefficiency by making wholesale personnel shifts in the economic ministries to energize performance and improve productivity.

[Redacted]

25X1

[Redacted] The major change thus far has been the replacement of the head of Cuba's central planning agency, JUCEPLAN, with the former Minister of Construction, a 43-year-old technocrat who apparently impressed Cuban officials with his management of that cumbersome ministry. The Minister-President of the State Committee for Finance—a cabinet-rank post—also was replaced by a young technocrat. In addition to naming a new Minister of Construction, Castro also has replaced the Ministers of Transportation, Sugar, and Light Industry.

25X1

25X1

Many other recent organizational and personnel moves in Cuba are likely to address longtime Soviet concerns by furthering the "institutionalization" of the revolution along the Soviet model. The major institutional change so far has been the clearer separation of the roles of the Communist Party and the government apparatus. A number of personnel changes have relieved Politburo members from their additional government duties as heads of ministries.

25X1

[Redacted] these moves are intended to emulate the more recent Soviet practice of putting technically qualified personnel in ministerial posts held hitherto by political appointees, cronies, or ideological hacks.

25X1

25X1

Dealing With Policy Differences

Judging from their public statements [Redacted] [Redacted] we believe Moscow and Havana are trying to ensure that their actions in the Third World more closely complement one another. Not only are the Soviets and Cubans continuing to probe for new opportunities in the Third World, but also may even be settling on a tacit understanding of which country should take the lead in exploiting them.

25X1

25X1

25X1

The two nations seem to be striving in particular to avoid working at cross-purposes in key nations such as Angola and Nicaragua, where continued support and a coordination of effort are essential to avoid a

25X1

Secret

Exploiting New Opportunities for Diplomatic Inroads and Subversion

Despite the rising costs connected with their Third World involvements, the Soviets and Cubans continue to exploit opportunities for expanding their presence and influence. Although a clearly defined Soviet-Cuban division of labor—either functional or geographical—is not supported by available evidence, we believe that in most cases they pursue coordinated—and parallel—policy approaches. The Soviets and Cubans work to build state-to-state ties in the Third World to gain economic and strategic access, undermine US relations with host governments, and create divisiveness between Washington and its allies on key policy issues. A case in point is Castro's assiduous efforts over the last year or so to court new civilian administrations in South America and socialist governments in Western Europe. These efforts—falling within the mainstream of Soviet policy in the two regions—are designed to end Cuba's isolation in the hemisphere and gain backing for Havana's positions on regional issues. [redacted]

The disparity in capabilities and resources between Cuba and the Soviet Union often dictates that they use different tactics and tools to win over potential allies in a target country. Moscow often uses military assistance and commercial trade to solidify its rapport with governments in power, trying to create a dependency relationship with the country and to build a pro-Soviet clientele within its leadership. In Seychelles, for example, [redacted] the Soviets exploited the government's political instability during 1981 and 1982 by quickly delivering to President Rene much-needed security assistance, and providing more than a dozen military advisers. Castro, on the other hand, relies on less costly policy tools such as personal diplomacy, tenders of training and technical assistance, sports and cultural exchanges, scholarship offers, and security training.

[redacted]

The expansion of Soviet and Cuban diplomatic relations and overall presence in the Third World create opportunities for covert support to radical leftist groups, both in the host country and its regional neighbors. Despite both Gorbachev's and Castro's current emphasis on diplomatic relations with a wide range of governments, both countries continue to support subversives and armed revolution—particularly against pariah regimes such as Chile and South Africa. [redacted]

[redacted]

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1
25X1

disastrous foreign policy setback. The Soviets, Cubans, and Angolans apparently have settled on a harder-line strategy regarding the US-mediated negotiations between Luanda and Pretoria and on future levels of Soviet-Cuban aid to the dos Santos regime. According to the US Embassy in Moscow, Soviet Foreign Ministry officials said that the Soviets and Cubans pressed the Angolans last year for improved economic performance, although both patrons agreed to provide increased aid to the government, including intensified Soviet training of Angolan military officers. Castro, using last year's visit of UN Secretary

General Perez de Cuellar as the backdrop for toughening his position, asserted publicly that a total of 200,000 Cubans had served in Angola since 1975 and that he was willing to send an equal number in the coming decade if necessary. [redacted]

The Cubans and Soviets appear to have synchronized their policy toward Nicaragua as well, as both countries are increasing their aid to the Sandinistas. Moreover, Havana and Moscow continue to reject any talks or accommodation between the Sandinistas and

25X1

Secret

Exploiting New Opportunities for Diplomatic Inroads and Subversion (continued)

25X1

Moscow and Havana also support, or at least maintain ties to, a host of Latin American insurgent groups. A Cuban leader admitted to a US official last year that Havana was supporting armed revolution in Chile, Guatemala, and El Salvador. [redacted]

25X1
25X1

Elsewhere in Africa, Cuban and Soviet advisers train and probably help direct the operations of SWAPO (South-West Africa People's Organization) insurgents from Angola against South African forces in Namibia. Cuba also has long been involved in support of Polisario insurgent forces battling Morocco for control over Western Sahara. [redacted]

[redacted] a contingent of some 75 to 100 Cuban medical personnel—located in western Algeria—have provided aid to Polisario forces since the early 1970s, and, over the last few years, Castro repeatedly has offered to provide the Polisario with military equipment and Cuban advisers. [redacted]

[redacted] Cuba trains members of John Garang's SPLA (Sudanese People's Liberation Army) in camps in Ethiopia and in Cuba. [redacted]

25X1
25X1

25X1
25X1

25X1

the armed opposition. Instead, their moves to date suggest that both the Soviets and Cubans agree that they will meet the insurgent challenge by incrementally strengthening the military aid program to the Sandinista armed forces, including the provision of equipment, training, and tactical advice. [redacted]

Lingering Problems

Despite the evidence of coinciding views on most issues, there are indications that Castro is continuing to resist the Soviets on certain subjects. For example, the Cuban leader apparently intends to press on with his goal of strengthening the electronics industry in Cuba and developing a genetic engineering capability even though Soviet economic officials have refused to assist such efforts. [redacted]

[redacted] the Cuban leader has consolidated all enterprises associated with electronics—which previously were spread across several government agencies—under a single new Ministry of the Electronics Industry. In a move that runs counter to the new ministerial personnel policy, Castro selected Ramiro Valdes, the former Minister of

25X1
25X1
25X1

Secret

Interior, to head the new ministry. Although Valdes has little experience in the electronics field and is best known for his ruthless approach to security matters, he has been a close associate of Fidel Castro since the days of the guerrilla struggle against Batista. Because of Valdes's unquestioned loyalty and his direct access to the Cuban leader, his appointment underscores the political as well as economic importance Castro places on the development of this sector. As a result, we believe there will be sharp disagreement between Moscow and Havana over this program especially if the Castro regime begins to divert scarce resources to its development. [redacted]

Evidence of Castro's continuing concern that any improvement in Moscow's relations with Washington could negatively affect its commitment to its Third World allies again became apparent during the Third Party Congress in early February this year. On the penultimate day of the congress, according to the US Interests Section, the delegates unexpectedly adopted a resolution approving—and explaining—Castro's remarks on foreign policy during his main report to the congress two days earlier. Vice President Carlos Rafael Rodriguez admitted to the delegates that the resolution had been so hastily prepared that there had not been time to distribute it in advance. The US Interests Section noted that compared to Castro's speech the document lavished considerably more praise on Soviet efforts to promote detente and was more outspoken in its approval of the general desirability of solving conflicts through dialogue and negotiations. The unprecedented resolution—in which Castro played no public role—was probably adopted to placate the Soviets, who may have been angered by Castro's failure to address adequately Moscow's broader effort to improve relations with the United States. Indeed, a TASS statement issued shortly after the resolution was approved emphasized the portions dealing with the peace struggle and negotiated settlements. Nevertheless, in his closing speech to the congress, Castro adopted an even more aggressive tone than his main report, speaking in emotional terms about confrontation with the United States.

Persistent differences between Moscow's East-West priorities and Castro's Third World focus carried over to the 27th Soviet Congress. Gorbachev's main address virtually ignored the Third World—focusing instead on Soviet-US arms control issues—while Castro centered his remarks on the Third World. In continuing his running debate with the Soviets over the relevance of superpower dialogue to Third World concerns (implicitly including Cuba), Castro called the struggle for economic development “no less stimulating” than that of avoiding war. Subtly chiding his Soviet colleagues, he explicitly asserted that the nations of the Third World “expect and are certain they will receive maximum solidarity from the socialist community in their struggle for just economic gains.”

Outlook and Implications for the United States

Given the benefits accruing to both countries from this relationship, their large investment in it, and its high level of institutionalization in the political, economic, and military areas, we expect Soviet-Cuban ties to remain strong. Nevertheless, bilateral tensions are likely to continue marring the alliance, in our judgment, and will offer occasional opportunities for the United States to pursue its interests. [redacted]

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

We believe that these disagreements and strains—particularly over economic issues—result from an unequal, complex patron-client relationship. Moscow seems increasingly intent on finding ways to ease the financial burden posed by its foremost Third World client, particularly as the USSR copes with its own petroleum and agricultural problems. Although we believe Castro's leverage with Moscow will be increasingly limited, he is likely to continue to press the Soviets for increased aid, and to cause bilateral frictions in doing so. []

The austerity and conservation measures already being implemented in Cuba indicate that Havana recognizes that Cuba must respond to Soviet demands, but Castro's open resistance on certain issues, such as the electronics industry [] suggests that movement on other areas may be slower and less complete than Moscow desires. Moreover, if Cuban frustration with Soviet aid levels spills over into public view again, it is possible that Castro may miscalculate the extent of Soviet patience and provoke Moscow into making a significant aid cutback. Such a move would have serious economic consequences for Cuba and could weaken Havana's ability to sustain its interventionist foreign policy at current levels. []

Even if relations remain essentially unchanged, as we expect, Cuba's bleak economic outlook and its massive—and still growing—dependence on the Soviet Union are likely to have further implications for the conduct of Cuban foreign policy. Castro will have to coordinate even more closely his own international initiatives with Moscow, and is likely to work even harder on the Kremlin's behalf to justify his requests for increased aid and to deflect Soviet pressures on him for domestic policy changes. Castro will be hard pressed to refuse a Soviet request to send military personnel to an endangered pro-Moscow regime in the Third World. Moreover, we have little doubt that Castro will continue to demonstrate unswerving loyalty—even if such actions damage his own image—to Moscow's foreign policy line in international organizations and to act on Moscow's behalf in Third World forums where the Soviets do not directly participate. []

Short of creating a serious disruption of Cuban-Soviet relations, which we consider unlikely, Cuba's adherence to Soviet policy and its economic dependence on the USSR also create opportunities for the United States to gain some political and propaganda advantage. Cuba's support for Soviet actions—such as the KAL airliner shootdown and Moscow's intervention in Afghanistan—undercut any Cuban pretension to genuine nonalignment and negate Havana's claim that the Soviet Union is the “natural ally” of the developing countries. Castro's alignment with Moscow on such issues exposes his duplicity when he suggests to sympathetic audiences in Western Europe and South America that he could be weaned away from the Soviet orbit by greater access to Western markets and aid. Also undercutting the “natural ally” thesis is Moscow's stinginess with economic aid to Third World countries, and its inability and unwillingness to compete with Western lenders and donors, even in such pro-Soviet client states as Ethiopia and Mozambique. []

Cuba's own economic problems, despite the massive flow of aid, will increasingly dampen Castro's ability to hold up Cuba as a model of development for the Third World. Indeed, we believe that economic austerity and consumer sacrifice measures already being implemented in Cuba will generate rising disillusionment with the regime, and will cause Castro to respond with repressive measures that would make the Cuban model even less attractive. Moreover, Havana's indebtedness to Moscow and to Western lenders, as well as Cuba's businesslike approach to its recent debt renegotiations, make Castro susceptible to charges of hypocrisy and meddling when he advocates that other countries cancel payment on their debts to international organizations. Meanwhile, Cuba's failure to meet performance targets set by its Western creditors, as well as the leveling off of Soviet economic aid, are likely to be damaging to Cuba's credit rating. []

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

At the same time, the continuing tension that underlies this relationship could also generate problems for US policy objectives. Although unlikely, it is possible, for example, that, given Cuba's long-term commitment to Angola and Nicaragua, serious foreign policy differences between the two countries could occur over issues relating to these two client states. In Nicaragua, Castro probably is far more attached to the Sandinistas than the Soviets, given Nicaragua's geographic proximity and cultural affinity to Cuba and Havana's role in helping the Sandinistas attain power. For Castro, the Marxist Sandinista regime is his only ally in the hemisphere and represents his only success in 26 years of promoting armed revolution in Latin America. Because of his close relationship with Nicaraguan leaders, we believe Castro would go further in acting independently of Moscow with regard to Nicaragua than on any other foreign policy issue, particularly if he perceived a danger to the large number of Cuban personnel stationed there and Moscow's unwillingness to increase its own support. Should the survival of the Nicaraguan Government be seriously jeopardized by the insurgents, we believe that Castro could possibly move out ahead of Soviet policy, perhaps sending troops to back up Sandinista forces or man major garrisons even at the risk of a serious dispute with Moscow. [redacted]

In Angola, it is the Cubans who might balk at upping the ante still further in order to prop up the dos Santos government against the South African-backed UNITA (National Union for the Total Independence of Angola) insurgents. Although Castro's recent tough talk on staying the course in southern Africa indicates that he is not prepared to abandon Cuba's 10-year commitment to Angola, [redacted] Cuban leaders are sensitive to continuing casualties among both Cuban troops and civilians, to rising morale problems among Cubans serving in Angola, and to discontent at home over the long-term involvement there. Castro might resist Soviet pressure to increase further the Cuban military presence or to step up their direct role in the counter-insurgency fighting if he believes there is little prospect of a quick military victory over the insurgents. Substantial gains by Savimbi's guerrillas, then, could result in serious Cuban-Soviet divisiveness as they grapple with how to meet the insurgent challenge.

[redacted]

25X1
25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

Appendix A

Longstanding Military Ties

The Cuban-Soviet military relationship generally has been characterized by far fewer frictions than bilateral economic or political ties. The massive stockpile of arms given to the Cubans and the large Soviet advisory presence from the early 1960s ensured a close military relationship. Even during serious downturns in Cuban-Soviet political relations, Havana and Moscow have maintained a closer military relationship than exists between the Soviet Union and any other non-Warsaw Pact country. For example, during the period from late 1966 to January 1968 when Cuban-Soviet relations were severely strained, Moscow's arms deliveries to Cuba were the highest since the massive 1962 buildup. Over the years, the organization of the Cuban Armed Forces has come to mirror the Soviet model, with Cuba's top military leader, Armed Forces Minister Raul Castro, making frequent trips to the USSR and developing a close relationship with Soviet military and political figures. [redacted]

Upgrading Cuban Defenses

Since Cuba's 1975 intervention in Angola, and especially during the past five years, all branches of the Cuban Armed Forces have been significantly upgraded with modern weapon systems supplied by the USSR. We estimate that the worth of Soviet military and military-associated deliveries to Cuba from 1981 to 1984 amounts to more than $3.0 billion. According to a [redacted] Cuban defector, this aid is provided free of charge. Even before this buildup, Cuba, in our view, was able to defeat any invasion force short of a serious effort by a major power. At present, the Intelligence Community estimates that a campaign designed to render Cuba's Armed Forces impotent would require approximately double the effort that would have been needed about five years ago. [redacted]

While the current buildup probably is designed, in large part, to deter any US military action against Cuba, Castro also derives numerous foreign policy benefits from his newly acquired military might. Soviet military aid improves Castro's capacity to support revolutionary regimes and movements abroad,

Significant Soviet Military Deliveries to Cuba Since 1981

[redacted] since 1981 25X1
the Soviets have:

- Upgraded Cuba's air defenses by delivering Cuba's first mobile surface-to-air missile systems, the SA-6 and SA-9, in 1981 and 1982; improving the existing SA-2 and SA-3 networks; and by continuing to deliver MIG fighters, including Cuba's first MIG-23 Flogger B interceptors in 1982.
- Provided more than 30 additional combat helicopters, including Cuba's first MI-24 Hind gunships and MI-14 Haze antisubmarine warfare helicopters.
- Strengthened Cuba's air defense [redacted] by providing new radars and, in February 1984, its first electronic data transmission system.
- Helped the Cubans expand and modernize their Navy by delivering additional guided-missile and torpedo patrol boats, amphibious landing ships, minesweepers, three Foxtrot-class submarines, and two Koni-class frigates. 25X1
- Provided Cuba's ground forces with more modern equipment; during 1984 alone, some 180 tanks, mostly T-62s, and more than 200 pieces of artillery were delivered.
- Bolstered Cuba's airlift capability by delivering two heavy transport IL-76 aircraft and expanded Havana's merchant marine fleet for the support of Cuban forces overseas. 25X1

25X1
25X1
25X11

[redacted] 25X1

Secret

Table 2
Soviet Deliveries of Military Goods to Cuba,
1962-84, Selected Years

	Identified Military Deliveries ^a		Military-Associated Deliveries ^b		Naval Deliveries ^c		Total Metric Tons
	Ship Voyages	Metric Tons	Ship Voyages	Metric Tons	Ship Voyages	Metric Tons
1962	125	250,000					250,000
1965	5	10,800					10,800
1970	8	11,300					11,300
1975	8	13,900					13,900
1976	13	19,500					19,500
1977	10	21,600					21,600
1978	12	22,200					22,200
1979	12	17,300					17,300
1980	14	20,900					20,900
1981	24	45,500	21	18,200			63,700
1982	15	24,540	47	35,470	6	3,730	63,740
1983	20	37,690	32	12,970	2	710	51,370
1984	23	41,870	23	8,510	6	4,220	54,600

25X1

25X1

adds international stature to Cuba's revolutionary government, and provides a means of gaining additional leverage with the USSR through demonstrated competence in the military arena. These benefits accrue not only through military hardware, but also by way of technical assistance, training, joint exercises, and improving the professionalism of the Cuban officer corps. [redacted]

The Kremlin's Caribbean Presence

From Moscow's perspective, costly investments in the Cuban military benefit its strategic objectives, and the Soviets have been strengthening their own assets on the island. Cuba is the USSR's largest and most valuable base outside the Soviet Union for intelligence collection against the United States. [redacted]

[redacted] the SIGINT complex at Lourdes

[redacted] is used to intercept US domestic and satellite communications, to track and collect data on US missiles launched from Cape Canaveral [redacted]

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

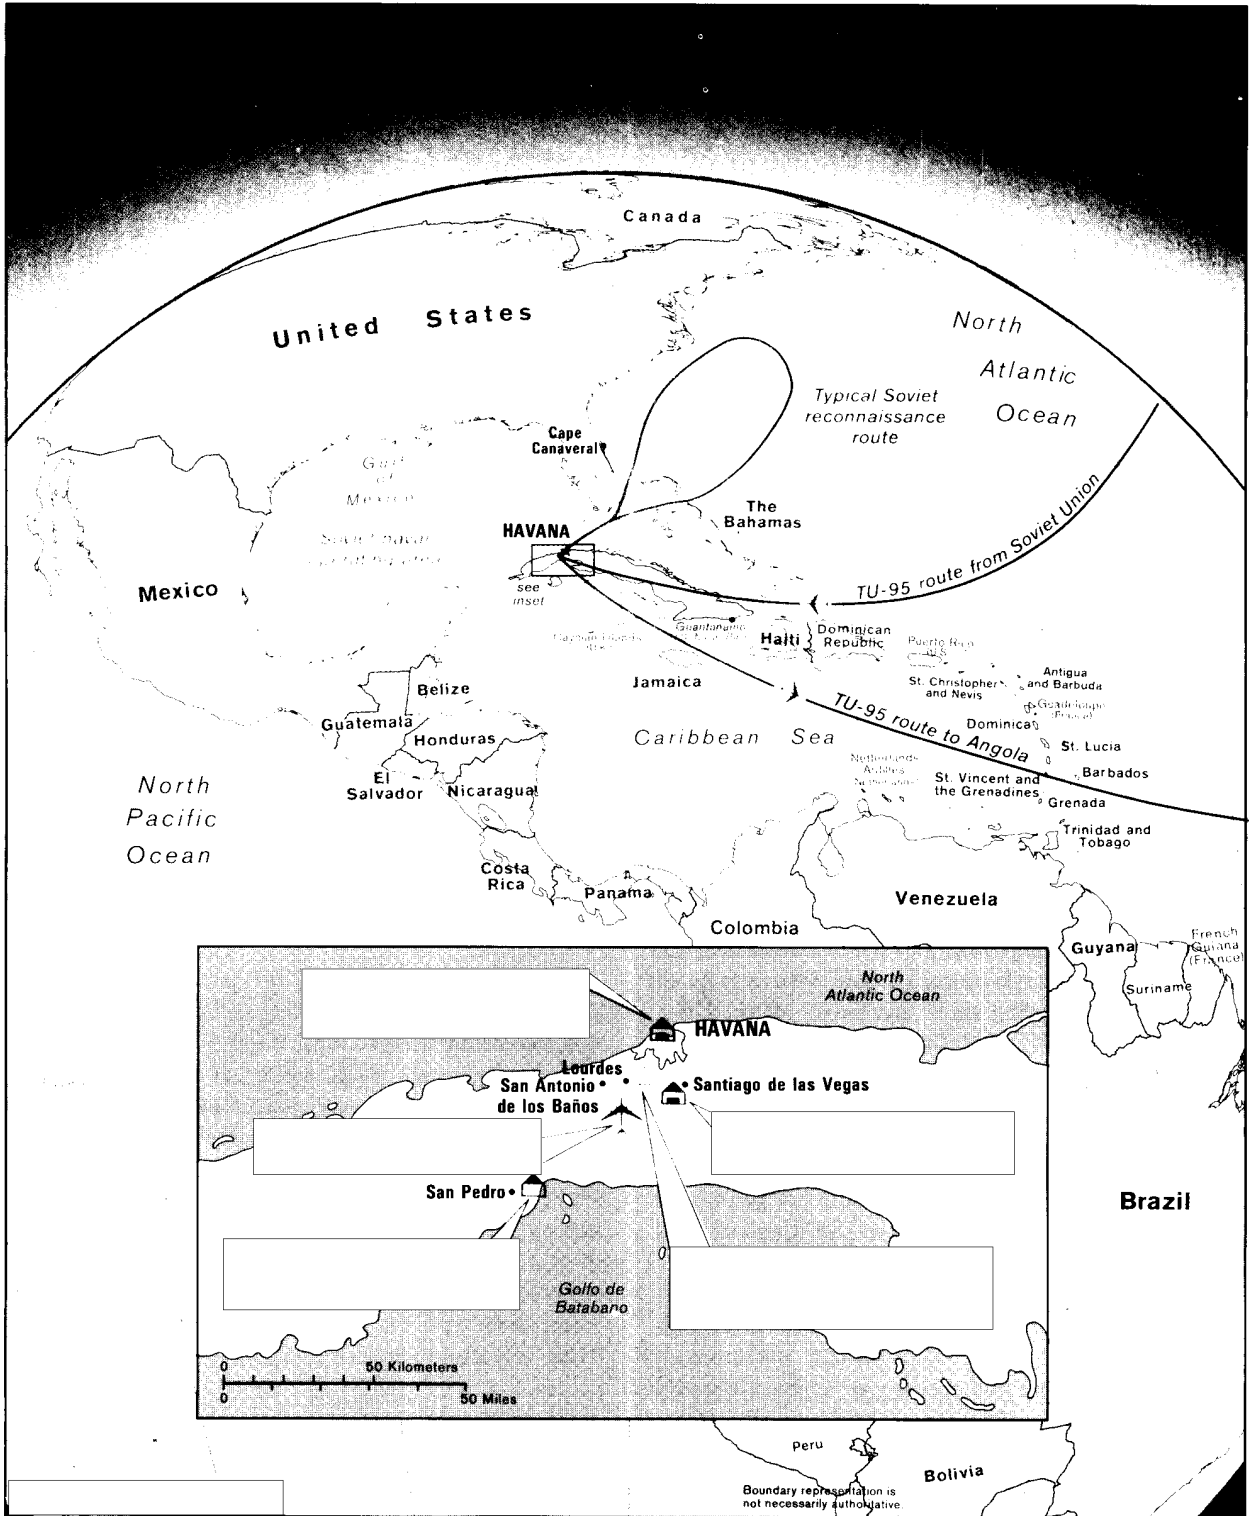

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

Figure 10
Soviet Reconnaissance Activities and Facilities in Cuba

707551 (A04683) 4-86

Secret

Secret

Figure 11. Soviet TU-95 (Bear D) reconnaissance aircraft at San Antonio de los Banos airfield, Cuba. The Bear D's have deployed to Cuba, on average, five or six times annually in recent years to collect intelligence on US naval operations off the east coast. Although they usually fly one or two missions during each deployment to Cuba, they have made as many as five. Soviet TU-142 (Bear F) aircraft also deploy from Cuba to conduct antisubmarine warfare reconnaissance. Soviet Bears also use Cuba as a refueling stop on deployments to Angola.

Approximately 1,900 to 2,100 Soviet personnel work on electronics, signals, and communications interception at the site. The Soviets also use Cuba for periodic naval visits, deployments of long-range naval reconnaissance and antisubmarine warfare aircraft, and port calls by the intelligence-gathering ships that patrol off the US east coast and in the Caribbean.

The Soviet brigade, estimated at about 2,600 to 2,900 men, is made up of one tank and three motorized rifle battalions, as well as fire-support battalions and combat service support units. These units are garrisoned in two facilities south of Havana—Santiago de las Vegas and Lourdes. Recent construction indicates a modernization of brigade facilities rather than expansion. The Intelligence Community believes the brigade is symbolic of Soviet commitment and only serves to provide security for Soviet facilities. The Soviet Military Advisory Group (MAG), currently estimated at 2,500 to 2,800 officer-level advisers and technicians, advises and trains the Cuban Armed Forces. The major elements of the MAG are located in the Kohly District of northern Havana, although Soviet advisers are also deployed with Cuba's Central and Eastern Armies.

construction activity in the Kohly District since 1980 indicates that the MAG has been expanded and has upgraded its communications capabilities.

Benefits and Limits of Soviet Military Commitment

The Cuban-Soviet military relationship has been beneficial for both Havana and Moscow. Unlike their economic ties, where Havana benefits from Moscow's shouldering the burdens of Cuba's inefficient economy, Soviet military investments have paid off handsomely for both countries. The Soviet-trained Cuban military has performed effectively in two major military campaigns, playing a key role in advancing Soviet foreign policy goals. Cuba's location and its military forces provide the Soviets with the capability to project power near the United States, collect intelligence on US military activities by monitoring US communications, and help the Soviet Union compete with the United States in the Third World. In addition, the Soviets probably hope that a militarily stronger Cuba, coupled with Havana's destabilizing activities, will help cause US policymakers to focus increased attention on the Caribbean Basin and divert resources away from primary areas of interest, particularly the Eurasian continent.

Although Soviet-backed military aid to Cuba has given Castro some offensive capability in recent years, it is still primarily a defensive force. The expansion and modernization programs, when added to Cuba's efforts at civil defense, are geared to making an attack on Cuba as costly as possible to the United States. The Soviets clearly are concentrating on providing a deterrent capability to the Cubans, probably hoping in this way to avoid a direct confrontation with the United States. The defensive nature of Soviet weapons and training also underscores public statements from Moscow and Havana indicating that Cuba will stand alone in any conflict with the United States.

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

25X1

Secret

Secret

Although economically integrated into the Soviet Bloc, Cuba is not a member of the Warsaw Pact, and the Soviet Union has refused to extend to Castro a written defense treaty. Nor has Moscow been willing to deliver to Cuba offensive weapons that would clearly give Castro the ability to provoke Washington. The Soviets, for example, have not sent advanced equipment such as MIG-25 fighters and SA-5 ground-to-air missile systems that could challenge SR-71 overflights—which other, less important, Soviet Third World clients have received.

25X1

Secret

Secret

Appendix BCycles of Strains*The Early Revolutionary Years: 1957-65

- 1956-59 Castro's struggle against Fulgencio Batista is virtually ignored by Soviet media and academics. Pro-Moscow Cuban Communist Party (Popular Socialist Party) does not support guerrilla war until 1958, after Batista's military offensive against Castro fails.
- 1960-61 Soviet attention to Cuba grows as Havana's relations with Washington become increasingly adversarial, encouraging Castro to seek outside economic and military support.
- 1960 Moscow and Havana open diplomatic relations, and Anastas I. Mikoyan, First Vice Chairman of the USSR, pays historic visit to Cuba to sign trade protocol, pledging Soviets to purchase 425,000 metric tons of sugar from Cuba's 1960 harvest and 1 million tons of sugar in each of subsequent four years.
- 1961 Castro declares himself a Marxist-Leninist.
- 1962 Castro discovers and purges a small pro-Soviet faction led by Anibal Escalante in March 1962 for attempting to capture his revolutionary organization.
- During October 1962 missile crisis, Soviets infuriate Castro by removing missiles without consulting him—a major source of discord in the relationship.
- 1962-63 Castro refuses to choose sides in Sino-Soviet rift, insists on armed struggle as major path to change—while Soviets are stressing peaceful change—and publicly criticizes Soviets for insufficient aid to Vietnam.
- 1963 Soviets recognize Cuba as full-fledged member of "socialist camp" when Castro makes first trip to the USSR during the period April-June 1963. Castro is awarded the Order of Lenin and receives the title of "Hero of the Soviet Union."
- 1964 In January, Castro makes his second trip to the Soviet Union in eight months.

Secret

Secret

Figure 12. Soviet Politburo member Anastas Mikoyan with Castro on Cuban tobacco plantation. Mikoyan headed a large trade delegation, and his visit resulted in a $100 million credit to Cuba and increased Soviet purchases of sugar, beginning Cuba's long-term economic relationship with Moscow.

Figure 13. Soviet warships in Havana harbor in 1969 during first visit of a Soviet naval task force to Cuba.

25X1

25X1

Cuba and USSR reach compromise on correctness of armed struggle versus peaceful change at December 1964 Conference of Latin American Communist Parties. Castro recognizes legitimacy of pro-Soviet Communist Party support for peaceful road; Soviets, in turn, acknowledge Communist support for armed struggle in several Latin American countries.

Havana and Moscow Split on Armed Struggle Thesis: 1966-68

1966

At Tricontinental Conference of January 1966, Castro insists on priority of armed struggle; chastises pro-Soviet Communist parties for lack of revolutionary commitment, and asserts independence within the Soviet embrace.

Cuba presses Soviets on their duty to aid liberation movements and advocates overthrow of governments with whom Moscow is conducting peaceful state-to-state relations.

Castro castigates Soviets and their allies for their relations with the "oligarchies" of South America.

Cuba broadcasts series of interviews with Latin American guerrilla leaders from Central and South America, stressing the role of armed struggle in national liberation.

1967

Regis Debray, the French revolutionary Cuban sympathizer, publishes a major book, Revolution Within the Revolution, laying out in detail the Cuban thesis on armed struggle. Debray's book challenges Soviet theory of peaceful change, downgrades the need for guerrillas to know Marxism-Leninism, and promotes a global policy advocating the Cuban armed struggle policy.

Secret

Secret

The Cuban-sponsored Latin American Solidarity Organization (LASO) convenes in August 1967 in Havana, its participants being leftwing extremists from throughout the hemisphere. Final declaration makes clear Havana's continued pressure on and independence from Soviets on the question of armed struggle.

Castro snubs Soviet Union by failing to attend the 50th anniversary celebration of the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution.

1967-68

USSR reacting to Cuba's maverick behavior by failing to match Cuba's sharply rising consumption of fuel with new oil deliveries, which causes gas rationing in Cuba. Construction of Cuba's first SA-3 anti-aircraft site is halted and converted into an SA-2 site after Soviet Prime Minister Kosygin visits Havana in June. Soviet-Cuban relations hit bottom.

1968

Castro conducts second purge of pro-Soviet faction from Communist Party, clearly asserting Cuba's nonsatellite status with the USSR.

In August, Castro publicly supports Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, signaling his readiness to improve relations with Moscow.

Havana and Moscow Pursue Converging Interests: 1969-75

1969

Cuba lessens criticism of pro-Soviet Latin American Communist parties.

Soviets make first naval visit to Cuba.

1969-70

Soviets sign trade protocols with Cuba, providing long-term credits to cover Cuba's rising trade deficits with USSR.

1970

Although attaining the largest sugar crop in history, Cuba falls far short of its 10-million-ton goal, an effort that caused serious dislocation to all other areas of the economy.

Sharp rise in scope and variety of Soviet aid to Cuba; Cuban-Soviet economic collaboration now coordinated through the newly created Intergovernmental Soviet-Cuban Commission for Economic, Scientific, and Technological Cooperation.

Secret

Secret

Figure 14. Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev with Castro in Havana in 1974. Brezhnev is presented with Cuba's highest honor, the Order of Jose Marti. It was the first visit of a Soviet leader to Latin America.

Figure 15. President Castro surrounded by newsmen after his address to the 27th Soviet Communist Party Congress in February 1986 in Moscow. Castro emphasized the strong bonds between Cuba and the Soviet Union, but also reminded Moscow not to neglect its Third World allies who are in need of Soviet assistance.

25X1
25X1

1972 Castro makes two lengthy trips to the USSR, signing important agreements for cooperation.

Cuba admitted to CEMA in July as a full member.

1974 Brezhnev visits Cuba; final declaration cites two countries' growing friendship.

1975 First Congress of Cuban Communist Party meets in December 1975. By December 1976, a National Assembly of People's Power, Council of State, and Council of Ministers mirrors Soviet political system.

Cuban-Soviet Cooperative Intervention in the Third World: 1975-79

1975-76 Havana and Moscow help consolidate rule of Angola's MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) during civil war period following collapse of Portuguese empire in Africa.

1977-78 Soviet and Cuban military personnel—including some 17,000 Cuban troops—defend strongman Mengistu's Ethiopian military regime against Somalia's invasion of the Ogaden.

1979 Cuba and USSR become involved in Grenada after successful coup by the New Jewel Movement ousts Prime Minister Eric Gairy.

Secret

Secret

Cuba provides arms, finances, and advisers to help Sandinistas overthrow Nicaraguan dictator, Anastasio Somoza. Soviets follow with military support once Sandinistas assume control in July 1979.

Castro becomes chairman of Nonaligned Movement at summit meetings held in Havana.

Strong Cuban-Soviet Relationship Faces Rising Costs and Strains: 1980-86

1980

Raul Castro in Moscow meeting with Soviet cosmonaut Yuriy Romanenko and Cuban cosmonaut Col. Arnaldo Tamayo at time of the joint Soviet-Cuban Soyuz 38 spaceflight.

Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in 1979 causes embarrassment for Castro and damages his tenure as chairman of the Nonaligned Movement when Havana eventually publicly backs Soviet invasion.

Cuba loses bid for UN Security Council seat, owing in part to its close association with the USSR on the issue of Afghanistan.

Third World's increasing complaints about Soviet inattention to North-South development issues causes embarrassment for Castro.

1981

Soviet military aid to Cuba increases from $347 million in 1980 to $795 million in 1981.

1983

US intervention in Grenada causes strains in Soviet-Cuban relations; differences in perceptions of causes of US intervention; Castro closely associated with Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and Soviets with Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard.

1984

Soviets do not send delegates to attend the 25th anniversary of the Cuban Revolution, held 1 January.

Castro is only Soviet Bloc head of state who fails to attend CEMA summit meeting held in June in Moscow; Cubans chafing for being relegated to supplier of natural resources to CEMA members, rather than pursuing more rapid industrialization.

Moscow sends only a low-level delegation to attend Cuba's 26th of July celebrations.

Cubans admonished by visiting Soviet economic delegation to improve on their efficiency and to cease purchasing Western agricultural equipment.

Secret

Secret

CEMA prime-ministerial meetings in Havana end with Castro and Tikhonov signing long-term cooperation agreement, but Soviets make clear that aid to Cuba will not rise beyond current levels during next five-year period.

1985

Cuban Foreign Minister Malmierca completes "friendly" visit to USSR in February; no final communique issued, and Malmierca admits in press interview that differences exist.

Castro snubs Russians by not attending funeral of Chernenko and passes opportunity to meet directly with new Soviet leader Gorbachev.

Soviet Politburo member Mikhail Solomentsev travels to Cuba in May for ceremonies commemorating the 25th anniversary of the renewal of diplomatic relations between Cuba and the USSR and makes effort to smooth over differences with Havana.

Fidel and Raul Castro, and nearly all of the Cuban Politburo members, attend inauguration of huge new Soviet embassy complex in Havana.

Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze makes two-day trip to Havana in late October, probably to assure Castro that Cuban interests would not be sacrificed at upcoming US-USSR bilateral talks on Central America. Shevardnadze is effusive in his praise of Cuba, although press reports on their substantive talks hint at continuing differences regarding Third World policy.

Moscow names Aleksandr Kapto as new Ambassador to Cuba. He replaces Konstantin Katushev who, as head of the Soviet State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations, will continue to be influential regarding Soviet-Cuban relations.

1986

Yegor Ligachev, Soviet Politburo member and second-ranking Soviet leader, attends Third Cuban Communist Party Congress in early February in Havana. The first foreign delegate to address the meetings, Ligachev told the Cubans that they could count on the USSR and that the Soviets would never let Cuba down.

Castro attends the 27th Soviet Communist Party Congress in Moscow in February, meets with Soviet leader Gorbachev, and is first foreign head of state to address the congress. Despite the red-carpet treatment accorded Castro, he implicitly called on Gorbachev not to abandon Moscow's Third World allies in his pursuit of strategic weapons agreements with the United States.

25X1

Secret

Secret

Table 3
Soviet and Cuban Presence in Third World Countries,
1975 and 1984, by Number of Military and Economic Technicians ^a

	1975				1984
	USSR		Cuba		USSR		Cuba
	Military	Economic	Military	Economic	Military	Economic	Military	Economic
Total	8,490	17,650	10,610	4,750	131,170	37,945	44,830	17,520
North Africa	1,005	3,085		15	2,775	10,965		3,865
Algeria	650	2,500		15	775	5,500		275
Libya	345				2,000	4,500		3,500
Mauritania						15		15
Morocco	10	450				750
Tunisia		130				200
Western Sahara								75
Sub-Saharan Africa	2,000	3,000	10,610	4,085	4,865	9,080	41,770	8,945
Angola ^b	100		10,000	3,000	1,200	1,500	35,000	6,000
Benin		10			5	20		30
Burkina		15				30		15
Burundi		30			20	35		20
Cameroon		10				45
Cape Verde					20	20		15
Central African Republic	10	145				10
Chad	5	85
Congo	330	120		150	340	400	260	140
Equatorial Guinea	30	10	200	150		15		15
Ethiopia		70			2,000	1,775	5,500	1,100
Ghana		55				10		40
Guinea	110	500	315	250	50	450	10	240
Guinea-Bissau	65	20	25	80	55	150	50	75
Kenya		10				25
Madagascar		5		25	70	300		35
Mali	35	210			50	500		10
Mauritius		5
Mozambique	25	10		100	800	600	800	900
Niger		5				30
Nigeria	45	115			10	2,800
Rwanda		10				10
Sao Tome and Principe					120		100	125
Senegal		15				40
Seychelles					10	5		20
Sierra Leone		10	20			10
Somalia	1,000	1,000	50	30

Footnotes appear at end of table.

Secret

Table 3 (continued)
Soviet and Cuban Presence in Third World Countries,
1975 and 1984, by Number of Military and Economic Technicians ^a

	1975		Cuba		1984		Cuba
	USSR Military	Economic	Military	Economic	USSR Military	Economic	Military	Economic
Sudan	80	35
Tanzania	55	200		290	65	75	50	150
Togo						5
Uganda	100	130		10		20		15
Zaire		10
Zambia	10	155			50	200
East Asia		25				15
Burma		10
Indonesia		15				5
Philippines						5
Singapore						5
Latin America	35	350		450	215	660	3,060	4,010
Argentina						110
Bolivia		40				45		5
Brazil		50				30
Colombia		5				50
Guyana				60			60	5
Jamaica				280
Nicaragua					100	225	3,000 ^c	4,000 ^c
Panama				60
Peru	35	240		50	115	200
Uruguay		15
Middle East	4,750	8,100		200	7,725	9,760		600
United Arab Emirates						30
Cyprus		50
Egypt	215	1,800				250
Greece						50
Iran	70	2,725				1,000
Iraq	1,035	2,150			1,200	5,500		400
Jordan					25	30
Kuwait						100
North Yemen	120	200			500	300
South Yemen	260	175		200	1,000	1,500		200
Syria	3,050	1,000			5,000	1,000

Secret

Table 3 (continued)

	1975				1984
	USSR		Cuba		USSR		Cuba
	Military	Economic	Military	Economic	Military	Economic	Military	Economic
South Asia	700	3,090			115,590	7,465		100
Afghanistan	350	920			115,000	5,000		100
Bangladesh	35	390			90	100
India	300	1,500			500	1,400
Maldives						5
Nepal		20				10
Pakistan		185				900
Sri Lanka	15	75				50

^a Minimum estimates of number present for one month or more, rounded to the nearest 5.

^b This data include statistics drawn from 1976, the year when more complete figures became available.

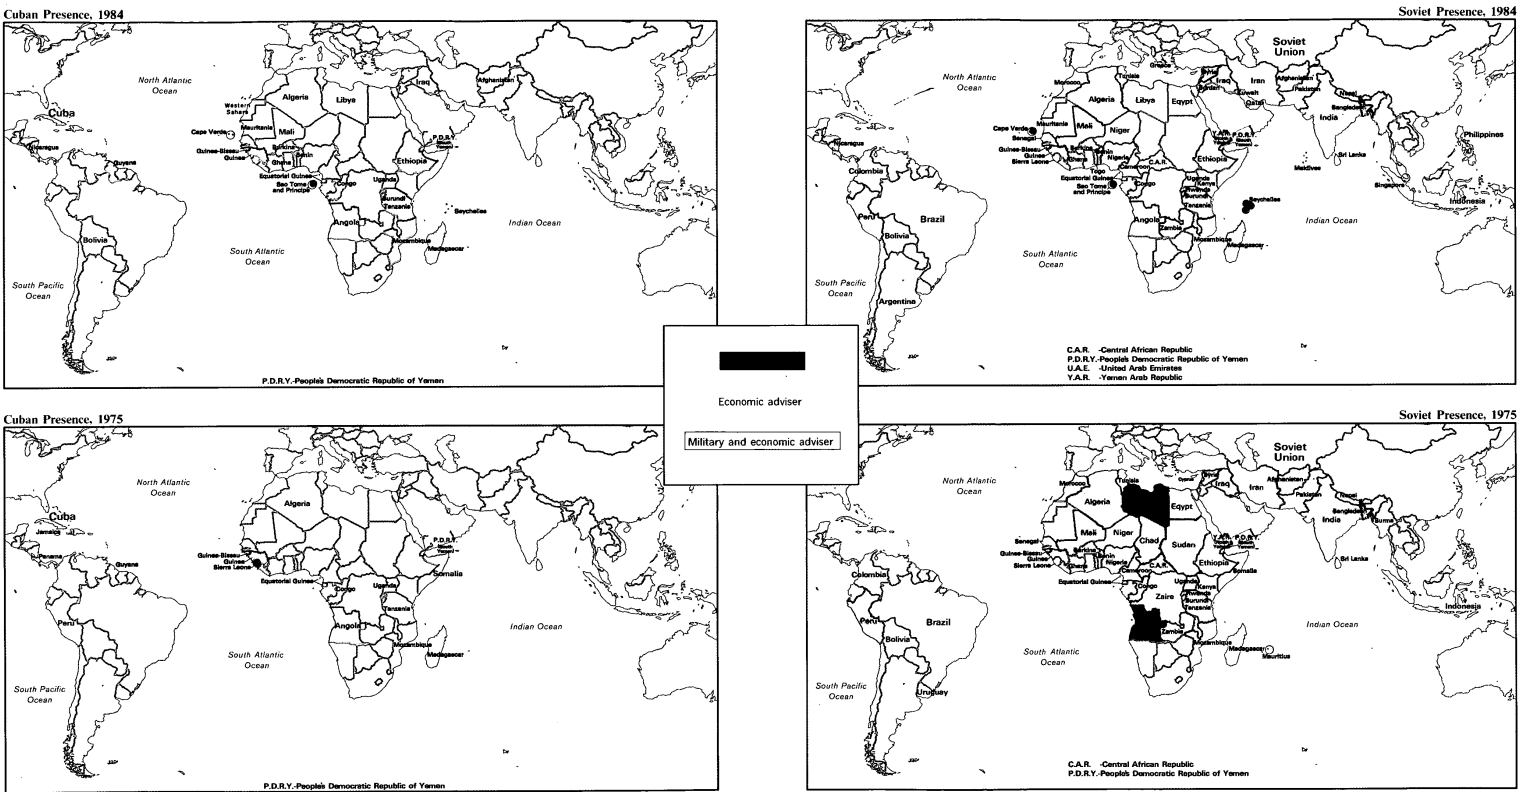

^c Intelligence Community estimates for Cuban advisers in Nicaragua are 2,500 to 3,500 military personnel and 3,500 to 4,000 civilian advisers.

25X1

Secret

Figure 16
Cuban and Soviet Presence in Third World Countries, 1984 and 1975

Secret

Secret