Dear Mr. Webster:

Thank you for your important contributions to the Bicentennial celebration. You are promoting significant understanding of the history and values of our Constitution, and we appreciate these effective initiatives from your agency.

During this five-year celebration, we would like to extend invitations to department and agency heads on a continuing basis for special events which the Speakers Bureau might arrange. This leadership is a frequent request as a principle source of influence and inspiration.

We have enclosed speeches and Bicentennial information which could be of assistance in preparation of remarks on the Constitution. We encourage disseminating materials throughout your department, with particular focus on the September 16 celebration.

Please feel free to contact us if we can provide you with any additional information. We will be calling you soon to discuss future ways in which the Speakers Bureau might work with you during these Bicentennial years.

Sincerely,

Jacklyn Giles MacInnis

The Constitution and the Bureaucracy

by MARTIN SHAPIRO

Americans think of their Constitution as doing a number of basic things. One is to protect the rights of individuals. A second is to set out the basic blueprint of the structure of government. Article I establishes a Congress to wield legislative power. Article II establishes a presidency to wield executive power. Article III creates a Supreme Court which, along with such other courts as Congress shall create, wields the judicial power. The Constitution appears to set out quite a simple, logical and complete plan for a national government. Yet the Constitution fails to provide for one of the largest and most important institutions of every national government, the bureaucracy. Without a bureaucracy the executive power would be meaningless, for the one man or woman who is president cannot personally "take care that" all the myriad laws of a modern nation "be faithfully executed."

This glaring constitutional omission was in part accidental. The very idea of bureaucracy becomes prevalent only with the writings of Max Weber, over a hundred years after the Constitution was written. The framers knew that the executive could not operate without a body comparable to the servants of the crown in England. Indeed, the Constitution does make one explicit reference to what we would call a bureaucracy: "The President ... may require the Opinion in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, ..." It has nothing more to say, however, largely because people had not yet come to think of the executive's servants as a body of persons with a distinct set of rules, roles, procedures and values that set them apart from the person who inhabited the presidency or kingship.

Yet the omission of bureaucracy

was in part deliberate. The Constitution could easily have said more about the bureaucracy. It does specify how government officers are appointed—some by the president alone and others by the president after an opportunity for the Senate to advise and consent. The Constitution also provides that members of Congress may not hold offices in the executive branch, thus preventing the sort of cabinet government that was emerging in England. The Constitution empowers Congress to establish a post office, an army and a navy. It could have gone on to specify what executive departments, such as treasury and state, should exist and, like many state constitutions, to provide a detailed organization chart for the whole executive branch. The framers did not undertake this task in part because they felt that the details of government organization should change from time to time in response to changes in the rest of the world. In part, however, they said little in the Constitution because they anticipated that the first president would be George Washington who would surely set the first administration on the right path. Thus the framers deliberately left the evolution of the personnel and organization of the executive branch to be worked out by Congress and the president in the future.

Because the Constitution contains this large hole and because bureaucracies touch the lives of so many Americans, the courts have had to create the constitutional law of bureaucracies. It is not that the courts are ever asked directly what a bureaucracy is or what its role is in our constitutional system. Instead these questions arise in cases that look like they are primarily about the legal or constitutional rights of individuals.

From a 'Spoils System' to the Career Service

Some constitutional litigation involves the intersection of bureaucracies and another institution about which the Constitution is even more silent, the political party. The Jacksonian Democrats developed a theory of bureaucracy in the 1820s, although they did not call it by that name. They argued that if government agencies were staffed by career employees, these governors would become an elite separated in spirit and outlook from the people they governed. The cure was "rotation in office." Each time one political party ousted the other from the control of the presidency or other elected executive post such as governor or mayor, all those appointed by the previous executive should be removed from office and replaced by appointees of the new executive. Thus, everyday citizens would move in and out of government as political fortunes changed. We would not need to worry about keeping the governing bureaucracy under control of the people because the people would be the bureaucracy.

This theory of bureaucracy was also a theory of party finance. As they evolved, European political parties supported themselves in a number of ways. Many, such as the British Labor or French Socialist party, became dues-paying, closed membership clubs. In return for paying dues, a member got a card and a right to vote in party elections. Others, like the British Conservative party, long supported themselves on private wealth. Wealthy families sent one of their sons into politics and provided him an annual income while he pursued his political career. Others yet, like the Communist and Monarchist parties, depended largely on ideological fervor of their partisans to yield many, voluntary, unpaid hours of party work.

American parties have rarely had dues-paying memberships. Neither family support nor ideological commitment has been sufficient to bring out enough party workers to staff election campaigns or to keep the parties alive between elections. In the nineteenth century, American parties instead relied on "rotation in office," or, as it is known less grandly, the "spoils system." With this system, the party simply promises that, while it can pay its workers nothing now, faithful workers will be given government jobs if the party wins the election. These jobs do pay and will continue to pay as long as the party keeps getting elected. Thus, the party is financed partly by the government.

The Jacksonian theory of bureaucracy and party held that government administration really was simple stuff. Any citizen rotated into office to enjoy the spoils that go to election victors could do the job for a while until replaced by a new set of winners. From the earliest days of the Republic, this premise was challenged by those who believed that the business of governing was a highly technical one requiring great experience, impartiality and expertise. First announced by the Federalists, this theory of bureaucracy as neutral expertise, and thus of the separation of government administration from the hurly burley of democratic politics, reached its high point in the Progressive movement around the turn of the century. The Progressives wanted to replace "rotation in office" with a professional career civil service, appointed on the basis of competitive examinations and shielded by law from political influence. Their greatest victory was the Pendleton Act of 1883 which established such a federal civil service.

The Progressive theory of bureaucracy sought to undermine traditional party supports. The Progressives saw the traditional party machines as the principal enemies of good public administration. The machines were the source of the graft, corruption and simple incompetence that marred American government. If "rotation in office" were ended, and with it the promise of jobs, the machines could not enlist the precinct captains and ward healers who were their front line troops. As a result the machines would run down and eventually disappear.

The Supreme Court entered the fray not in the form of direct decisions about whether the Constitution had approved one theory or the other, but indirectly. One of the statutes amending and improving the Pendleton Act was the Hatch Act of 1939 which forbade federal employees from contributing to or participating in party election campaigns. Its basic intent was to protect civil servants from political pressure. If they were forbidden by law from engaging in political activity on behalf of any party, they could not be pressured by the president or those he appointed as secretaries and assistant secretaries of the various government departments to be active on the side of the president's party.

A number of civil servants saw things differently, however, and challenged the Hatch Act as a violation of their constitutional, First Amendment, right to participate in politics. The Supreme Court usually holds that First Amendment rights are not absolute. If the government is limiting speech for a sufficiently compelling reason, it may do so constitutionally. In the course of explaining the compelling government interest that was to be balanced against the individual civil servants' First Amendment rights, the Supreme Court provided a ringing endorsement of the Progressive theory of bureaucracy. The Court held that the government's interest in an expert, neutral, career civil service clearly separated from politics outweighed First Amendment considerations. In upholding the Hatch Act, the Supreme Court read "rotation in office" out of the Constitution.

Some years later, the Court used the Constitution to abolish the remnants of the "spoils system" that had survived the Progressive era. A number of attorneys employed by Cook County, the county in which Chicago is located, had been appointed to their jobs as prosecutors when one party won a county election. The next time around, the other party won, and in 1971 it sought to replace these prosecutors with its own party faithful. The old prosecutors argued that their First Amendment rights were being abridged—they were being fired from their jobs solely because of their political beliefs. The Supreme Court did not exactly ignore the time-honored place of the "spoils system" in American political life, but it did treat it as irrelevant. Focus on the First Amendment claim, a majority of the Court confirmed that firing government workers just because of their political views was a violation of their rights to free speech and association.

In order to encourage the acceptance of the civil service concept, new civil service statutes often contained clauses providing for "blanketing in" present employees. Whenever more federal, state and or local government jobs were brought under civil service designation, workers already on those jobs were allowed to keep them rather than having to compete for them in new examinations. "Blanketing in" was politically essential to the passage of most civil servant legislation. It meant that existing government workers appointed under the "spoils system" would not only cease to oppose civil service laws but would vigorously support them because the new laws would secure their jobs even if the other party won an election. In its Cook County decision, the Supreme Court in effect "blanketed in" every one of the remaining spoils appointees in the United States. The Progressive theory of a bureaucracy of neutral "experts," free from political party control, had become part of the Constitution not as separate clauses but as an interpretation of the First Amendment.

Whose Bureaucracy?

Today, the most important dispute about the constitutional position of the federal bureaucracy is being fought out in cases that appear not to relate to the Constitution at all. In these cases, the parties are not claiming that a particular government action is unconstitutional but only that it is unlawful; not that it violates the Constitution, but only that it violates some statute enacted by Congress. These cases raise the most difficult constitutional question of all about the bureaucracy—to which branch of government does it belong?

The simple schema of the first three articles of the Constitution—Article I which describes Congress, Article II which establishes the presidency, and Article III which provides for the judiciary—would seem to place the executive departments, such as treasury and interior, and the bureaucrats who work in them, squarely under the control of the president who holds not a part of but all of "the executive Power of the United States." Particularly from the time of the New Deal onward, constitutional and political commentators have urged more and more centralized control by the president over an executive branch that was constantly growing in size and complexity. The Nixon presidency, however, brought denunciations of the "imperial presidency" from the same people who had espoused the strong presidency earlier. And the Reagan presidency, with its campaign to cut back on big government, including the big executive branch, has led those who favor more rather than less government activity to re-examine the actual legal status of the executive departments.

When they do so they encounter a very curious phenomenon of

In spite of what would seem to be the clear structure of the first three articles of the Constitution, the federal departments are not the servants of the president but the creatures of Congress.

American law. In spite of what would seem to be the clear structure of the first three articles of the Constitution, the federal departments are not the servants of the president but the creatures of Congress. Precisely because Article II does not authorize any specific executive departments or provide an organization chart of the executive branch, each federal executive department and agency must be created by a statute enacted by Congress. The agencies not only exist by virtue of such statutes but each and every one of their powers and programs must be authorized by statute and each and every dollar they spend must be appropriated by statute.

It is not that Americans suddenly discovered this legal arrangement. In some sense they knew it all along. In the middle and later 1970s, however, with the presidency in the hands of one party and Congress in that of the other, more observers came to recognize the contradiction between the legal basis of the executive departments as congressional creations and the position of the president as chief executive.

This contradiction is now being discussed in the federal courts. The Reagan administration has inherited hundreds of executive branch programs and regulations that it would like to eliminate, cut back or redirect. In some cases, the administration believes that a regulation imposes impossible tasks on the companies being regulated, and or creates costs that far outweigh any possible benefits and or is based on factual data that is wrong or incomplete and or misreads the intent of the statute that the regulation is designed to implement. Wielding the powers of the chief executive, administration officials have rescinded some regulations, refused to go forward with others that were in the bureaucratic pipe line when Mr. Reagan took office, and reduced the tempo of enforcement of yet others. The Reagan administration has argued that many of these regulations and styles of enforcement had been adopted by the departments in pursuit of the policy ideas of President Carter and his appointees. That course, Reagan's aides say, was perfectly legitimate, but it is equally legitimate for a newly elected president with different ideas to modify the practices of his executive branch to conform to his ideas. Those who oppose President Reagan's policies have responded that the regulations and programs that existed when he took office were mandated by Congress and to stop or change them now violates those statutes. Typically, the issue has reached the courts when those who favor retention and extension of the old regulations ask the court to require the agency to enforce the statute. These cases involve the huge body of statutory and case law about the procedures that agencies must use in making, unmaking and enforcing their own regulations that lawyers call "administrative law."

Because these are complex administrative law cases, few people become aware of the underlying constitutional debate. The debate arises because many congressional statutes not only authorize or empower executive agencies to do things but, at least according to some interpretations, order them to do things. Not just President Reagan, but all presidents, have argued that the president has the authority under Article II to decide just how the laws shall be "faithfully executed" and thus the discretion to decide when, against whom, and under what circumstances the law should be carried out.

Agencies live between the duties imposed upon them by statute and the executive discretion wielded by the president as head of the executive branch. In a common sort of law suit in this area, an environmental group might insist that a particular statute, say the Clean Air Act, imposes a duty on the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] to achieve clean air now. The agency thus has a duty to formulate the best possible air pollution regulations based on available data and enforce them immediately. The EPA will reply that no statute can ever be read as commanding an agency to make regulations and punish people for violating them before the agency is sure that it knows enough to make a good regulation. Thus the EPA must have discretion to decide when it will make a regulation. Furthermore, the EPA has only so much time, staff and money to enforce its regulations and never enough to enforce all of them on everybody. Thus it must have discretion to pick and choose its enforcement actions to get the most "bang" for its enforcement "buck". And precisely because these judgments are discretionary, they must be exercised in accord with the policies of the only person who has constitutional authority to control the discretion of the executive branch—the president.

When a court decides whether, in a particular instance, an agency has a statutory duty or, alternatively a measure of discretion, the court is deciding whether the agency belongs to Congress or the president. Depending on the circumstances, the statutory language and the underlying constitutional theory of the judge, individual decisions go one way or the other. Over the years, however, the collective impact of these decisions will move the federal bureaucracy more toward Article I (congressional authority) or more toward Article II (presidential control) and thus determine a fundamental aspect of our constitutional law even though these cases do not overtly raise constitutional questions. This issue, like many constitutional issues, is never totally resolved, but the courts are currently deeply engaged in determining the extent of presidential control of the actions of the executive departments.

Legislative Veto

The Supreme Court has spoken specifically about the constitutionality of congressional control of the bureaucracy in one recent case involving the "legislative veto." In a number of statutes, Congress has delegated to executive agencies the power to make rules and other kinds of decisions, but it retained for itself the right to veto these rules within a specified time. Only after Congress approved the agency action, or refused to disapprove it, did the agency's action become legally binding. These provisions allowed Congress to grant a great deal of discretion to the agencies while at the same time maintaining control over the final decision.

In Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha (1983), the Supreme Court held one such veto provision unconstitutional and did so in broad enough language to suggest that most such provisions were invalid. The Court focused not on the constitutional problems of bureaucracy and administration but on the president's veto power. The details of legislative veto clauses varied, but all provided that the congressional veto be exercised by votes and resolutions not subject to presidential veto. The Court held that Congress' action of disapproving an agency decision was itself a legislative action like the passage of a new law. Thus, it was unconstitutional for Congress to take such actions in ways that denied the president his constitutional authority to veto new legislation.

Chadha generally has been interpreted as a pro-president, anti-Congress decision. It does reduce the power of Congress to limit the discretion exercised by the federal bureaucracy. It does not, however, increase presidential control over that bureaucracy. Indeed, it tends simply to grant more autonomy to the bureaucracy. Recent presidents have sought to increase their authority over agency rule-making by executive orders requiring that proposed agency rules be cleared through the Office of Management and Budget, which is part of the president's own staff. These executive orders, and particularly any attempt by the president to prevent a proposed rule from coming into legal effect, raise their own serious constitutional problems.

Conclusion

Although the Constitution does not provide specifically for bureaucracies, courts decide bureaucracy cases under a wide array of constitutional and non-constitutional provisions that do not even use the words. In doing so, the courts shape not only the bureaucracy, but the relationship between Congress and the president. We are used to thinking of that dynamic relationship as a direct struggle between Congress and president over such questions as whether the president has the power to withhold documents from Congress or to send troops into combat without a congressional declaration of war. But there is also a struggle between Congress and president about just how much power each should have over the work of the federal bureaucracy, work that constitutes almost all of the activity of government that actually touches the daily lives of the citizenry. As the courts referee this rivalry, we can expect different constitutional balances to be struck at different times depending on changing political circumstances and changing political theories of Congress and the presidency. The developing constitutional law of the bureaucracy shows that the Constitution can be made to respond to circumstances unforeseen, indeed even to institutions unmentioned, in the original document.

Competition	National Bicentennial Competition on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights - The Center for Civic Education has developed a six-week instructional program for students at the high school level, designed to help students gain an understanding of the fundamental principles of our constitutional democracy as well as knowledge of their background and historical development. Once the instruction is completed, students choose whether to participate in a national competition in which entire school classes compete as teams to determine congressional district, state, and national winners. The competition is in a quiz-bowl format where students answer a series of questions that were preselected and/or random questions created by the judges.	04/24/88	04/28/88	Andrews, Tammy Center for Civic Education Fort McNair, DC	(818) 340-9320

Tour	Annapolis, Maryland - This historic town was the site of the Annapolis Conference on September 11-14, 1786. Delegates from New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania and Virginia met at the Maryland State House to discuss the volatile state of the colonies. Other states sent delegates but they did not arrive on time to participate in the discussions that led the members to exceed their original purpose and call for a national convention to amend and revise the Articles of Confederation.  Many historic 18th-century homes and buildings are parts of various tours to include: Middleton Tavern, an "Inn for Sea Faring Men;" Tobacco Prize House, historic warehouse; William Paca House, five-part mansion built in 1765; Brice House, considered "the most magnificent Georgian residence in America;" Hammond Harwood House, Georgian mansion designed by William Buckland, designer of Gunston Hall (home of George Mason, delegate from Virginia to the Constitutional Convention); Maryland State House, oldest state capitol in the United States and numerous other historic sites.  Guided tours are available from Historic Annapolis, Inc. Tours, Old Treasury Building, State Circle (301) 267-8149; Three Centuries Tours, 48 Maryland Ave. (301)	/ /	/ /	Historic Annapolis Inc. Exhibit	"Capital City: New York After the Revolution" - Located in the colonial (1762) tavern that was the site of George Washington's farewell to his troops in 1783, this exhibit examines the city's role as the political center of the nation during the late 18th-century. Objects and documents from the Tavern's collection include: "Federal Hall, the Seat of Government," an engraving by Amos Doolittle; "Six Views of New York," oil paintings by William Chappel; "The Signing of the Constitution," an oil by Thomas Pritchard Rossiter, a door of the carriage used by George Washington at the time of his first inauguration, and many others. On display through 1989. Free admission from 10 AM - Noon, weekdays and selected Sundays. $2.50 Adults, $1 Children, seniors from Noon - 4 PM, Mon. - Fri.	/	/	Fraunces Tavern Museum 54 Pearl St. New York, NY	(212) 425-1778
Exhibit	Trinity Church: The graveyard, which predates the original church built in 1698, bears witness to the historic role played by Trinity Parish over the years. Alongside the bodies of Alexander Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, Robert Fulton, and Captain James Lawrence was found, in the 1960's, the body of an unknown English soldier from the Revolutionary War, still in his red coat, along with a dagger broken in two, the symbol of military defeat. The permanent exhibit in the Trinity Museum, Manning Wing of the church is entitled, "The Parish of Trinity Church in the City of New York: The Evolution of an Urban Institution. The current exhibit open until March, 1989 is entitled, "Trinity and the Newcomer: Three Centuries of Outreach to Immigrants and Migrants from Early 18th-Century to the Present. Historical Site	Philadelphia. Originally built in 1773, the tavern was reconstructed in 1976 for the U.S. Bicentennial. Open seven days a week for lunch (11:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.), cocktails and dinner (5 p.m. to 10 p.m.). The tavern accepts reservations. The menu, furniture, and staff garb are from the colonial era.	/ /	/ /	Philadelphia, PA	( ) -
Historical Site	In commemoration of the nation's Bicentennial in 1976, the Liberty Bell, cherished symbol of American Freedom, was moved from Independence Hall to the glass-walled structure that now encloses it. According to tradition, the crack now seen on the bell occurred while it was being rung in mourning the death of Chief Justice John Marshall in 1835. The pavilion is open 9 AM to 5 PM daily (until 8 PM in the summer).	/ /	/ /	Liberty Bell Pavilion Market Street between Fifth and Sixth Streets on Independence Mall Philadelphia, PA	( ) -
Historical Site	The Library Company of Philadelphia, the oldest subscription library in the United States, first built its hall here in 1789-90. Delegates to the Continental and Federal Congresses and the Constitutional Convention used the facility. Documents in the collection include Benjamin Franklin's will, a copy of the Declaration of Independence in Thomas Jefferson's handwriting, and William Penn's 1701 Charter of Privileges. The library is open only to serious scholars from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily except holidays.	/ /	/ /	Library Hall 105 South Fifth Street Between Chestnut and Walnut Streets Philadelphia, PA	(215) 546-2465
Historical Site	The Pemberton House has exhibits on the formation of the U.S. Army and Navy from 1775 to 1800, as well as a twelve-minute film about the colonial army. The Marine Corps Memorial Museum in New Hall features displays on Marines from the time of their founding in Philadelphia in 1775 to their service in the Revolution from 1775 to 1783.
