DRAFT PRESS GUIDANCE

A recent study conducted under the auspices of the General Services Administration identified a deficiency in some of the commercially available, combination security locks now used by the United States Government. The locks at issue are the high security type which have been certified to meet or exceed the current GSA standards for forced entry and manipulation resistant protection. The problem identified in the GSA tests was not a result of defective locks or materials. The deficiency was found through an application of new and very sophisticated technology not available when the current standards were formulated. Fortunately, this deficiency can be accommodated through application of corrective procedural security measures.

All the USG departments and agencies using these locks have been appropriately notified of the problem and the corrective action recommended. Too, the GSA is in the process of revising high security lock standards.
