Mr. President

I rise in support of HR 8427 which immonstrate that has as its purpose the establishment of a retirement and disability system for certain employees of the Central Intelligence Agency, and in so doing. Before commenting upon the merits of the Bill itself, build, I should like to briefly speak, about the Agency and its place in our system of government.

The centralization of the months collection, coordination, collation and evaluation processes of U.S. intelligence as we know it today, came into being with the National Security Act of 1947. This Act, the culomission of in addition to establishing a channel for intelligence to the President, established the Central Intelligence Agency as the focal point of our intelligence community; and the minum position of the Director of Central Intelligence and his two-fold job as principal administrator of the CIA and coordinator of US intelligence activities. The circumstances, both pre-war and post war, which led to the National Security Act of 1947 is too well know by the members of the Senate to require any explanation or elaboration by me. What is important, however, is the early recognition given to the fact that intelligence information is am essential to the national security of the United States, and the free-world's interests, as well. This need has not waned in the interceding 13 years; but has become increasingly important with each passing year.

Jit features to assure that it will be applied only to those pends employees for which it is intended. First, it spells out in yeary title and statement of purpose that it is for certain and employees; it does not cover the vast majority. Second, it requires that the regulations, which the Director of Central Intelligence must prepare under this bill and which will spell out the qualifying standards in detail, be approved by that charimen and ranking monority members of the Armed Services Committees of the House and the Senate. Third, it sets minemant forth the types of duties which qualify for coverage under the bill in general but descriptive language. Fourth, it limits the number of retirees under the system to 800 for approximately the first ten years of its operation.

I think that the Bill we have reported will assure the continuing and increasing effectiveness of the CIA. One which is badly needed now, because the 20th anniversary of the Agency is but three years away, and many have been laboring under the conditions I have described for some 17 years now. Orderly planning of their retirement and for their replacement; requires action were. The bill in no way over-rewards those who have dedicated their ninversament working lives and sometimes their lives to a monumental task under most onerous conditions. The bill has been tightened up in every conceiveable way, consistent with security, to assure it is implemented and applied in keeping with the principles that went into its formulation. This is a good and needed Bill and is most assuredly deserving of your
