

ARTICLE APPEARED
ON PAGE 23

HUMAN EVENTS
18 August 1984

Intelligence Identities Act: Words, No Teeth

By REP. HENRY J. HYDE (R.-III.)

As a member of Congress, I frequently witness legislative efforts that are long on symbolism but short on substance. Sometimes these efforts are so useless that they remind me of a baseball pitcher with the stylish windup of Hall of Famer Sandy Koufax but who forgot to pick up the ball!

A case in point is the Intelligence Identities Protection Act that Congress passed a couple of years ago. What triggered this nobly intended—but ineffective—initiative was a relentless stream of disclosures. Certain individuals, including turncoat U.S. intelligence officer Philip Agee, were busily and systematically disclosing the names of those clandestinely employed by the various U.S. intelligence agencies.

The CIA station chief in Athens was killed after his cover was blown by the magazine CounterSpy. Subsequently, in a near tragedy, the homes of the U.S. Embassy's first secretary in Jamaica and an AID employe were fired upon shortly after the American editor of Covert Action Information Bulletin claimed in a press conference that those U.S. officials and 13 other Americans, as well as Jamaicans, were associated with the CIA.

In this instance, not only were the names of these individuals revealed, but also their home addresses, telephone and auto license numbers. Fortunately, the American officials and families involved in this attack survived unscathed. It was a close call, however, as two of the bullets penetrated the bedroom window of one of the children who was providentially away at the time. Against this compelling backdrop, Congress finally attempted to remedy a situation that was seriously undermining human intelligence collection efforts around the world.

Lamentably, the legislation that eventually emerged was so watered down that it has not really accomplished its objective of deterring the exposure of undercover intelligence personnel.

After considerable debate, Congress determined that for a non-government individual to be convicted under this legislation, the government would have to prove that such a person had engaged in "a pattern of activities intended to identify and expose covert agents and with reason to believe that such activities would impair or impede the intelligence activities of the United States."

Clearly not covered by this legislative provision would be those journalists who, during the course of a story, casually mention the name of a covert intelligence operative. Particularly instructive in this regard is the conference report to the Identities Protection Act which offers the following interpretation:

"A journalist writing stories about the CIA would not be engaged in the requisite 'pattern of activities,' even if the stories he wrote included the names of one or more covert agents, unless the government proved that there was an intent to identify and expose agents. To meet the standard of the bill, a discloser must be engaged in a purposeful enterprise of revealing identities—he must, in short, be in the business of 'naming names.'"

Armed with this congressional analysis and legislative history, many journalists have no qualms about dropping the name of an undercover agent in order to make a story a little "sexier" or seemingly more credible. For example, the Washington Post ran an article by correspondent John Lantigua in an early July 1984 edition that illustrates my point.

The thrust of the story concerned an American citizen waiting to be tried in Nicaragua for espionage. Among other things, Lantigua reported that this individual declared that he sold intelligence information to a U.S. diplomat whom Lantigua named and claimed an unnamed former U.S. State Department official had revealed as having been employed by the CIA.

In my opinion, such a titillating disclosure violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Identities Protection Act.

(Incidentally, it is interesting and ironical to note that Lantigua took pains to protect the anonymity of his ex-State Department source while having no compunction whatsoever about revealing the alleged CIA ties of a U.S. Embassy employe who may have been falsely identified as can be the case in leaks of this nature.)

STAT

Continued