Win Some, Lose Some — A recent confidential intelligence report sums up the Kremlin's latest achievements on the international scene this way: "The Soviets have gained footholds, whether through proxies or in their own right, in Afghanistan, South Yemen, Ethiopia, Angola, Grenada, Vietnam and, of course, Cuba."

The report continues: "The importance of such footholds in terms of giving the Soviets access to port and repair facilities, and of providing staging and landing rights, training areas and other indispensable support to military activities, should not be underestimated."

Another classified summary tots it all up, saying: "At the present time, Soviet advisers or military personnel can be found in 30 countries adhering formally to the Neutral and Non-Aligned (NNA) Movement; Soviet arms are being sold to 33 NNA nations."

The gloomy cloud of Soviet aggression has its silver lining, though, according to the U.S. intelligence analysts' report: "Soviet attempts to insert a presence outside their own territory have met with setbacks as well as successes. Their record is hardly unblemished."
