

RADIO TV REPORTS, INC.

4701 WILLARD AVENUE, CHEVY CHASE, MARYLAND 20815 (301) 656-4068

FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS STAFF

PROGRAM CBS Evening News STATION WDVM TV
CBS Network

DATE July 18, 1985 7:00 PM CITY Washington, DC

SUBJECT CIA Activities

DAN RATHER: The House today passed and sent to the Senate a secret fiscal - '86 budget for the CIA and other intelligence agencies. Few details, few numbers, few explanations were given. We do know that, among other things, the CIA is engaged in a well-publicized secret war in Central America, a war commanded not by any Army general, but by a 72-year-old former Wall Street lawyer.

Pentagon correspondent David Martin profiles Casey's CIA.

DAVID MARTIN: Lights burn late at the CIA. This was one of the first buildings to go on alert last month when TWA Flight 847 was hijacked.

The U.S. rushed a 20-man counter-terrorist team to Sicily to prepare for a possible rescue mission. More than half the team came from the CIA. A rescue was never attempted, but the episode shows how deeply involved the CIA is in the battle against terrorism. That is only one of the battles to which the CIA is committing new forces.

CIA is nearing completion of its biggest buildup since the Vietnam War, a buildup run by William Casey, Director of Central Intelligence. His close ties to the President, combined with recorded increases in the intelligence budget, have made Casey perhaps the most powerful CIA Director since Allen Dulles.

WALTER HUDDLESTON: CIA Director Bill Casey is certainly of the old school, and he believes that the agency should be a force and should be an entity to deal with throughout the world.

OFFICES IN: WASHINGTON D.C. • NEW YORK • LOS ANGELES • CHICAGO • DETROIT • AND OTHER PRINCIPAL CITIES

Material supplied by Radio TV Reports, Inc. may be used for file and reference purposes only. It may not be reproduced, sold or publicly demonstrated or exhibited.

MARTIN: This new building will double the size of CIA Headquarters, making room for more computers and people. In the last five years, there has been an increase of about 30 percent in the number of people working for the CIA. The CIA would like to hire even more.

Many of the new recruits come here, to "The Farm," a CIA training base complete with pop-up targets and its own private airstrip. Hundreds of new intelligence officers trained here have been sent overseas, many to Central America, Asia and Africa, areas which had been neglected for many years. So many new officers have been sent overseas, the CIA is having trouble finding cover jobs to mask their real occupations.

But Casey cannot build up a worldwide network of agents overnight, particularly when the CIA is still worried about running afoul of Congress.

SENATOR WILLIAM COHEN: I think it's too early to count it a success yet. I think they're still a little bit gun-shy, and I'm not sure that's all bad.

MARTIN: What the CIA learns overseas goes into classified intelligence estimates. The CIA is turning out three times as many now as in the 1970s. The analysts have scored some successes: predicting Yuri Andropov's rise to power, and spotting Mikhail Gorbachev early on as a real comer. But they were surprised by Argentina's occupation of the Falklands and by the ouster of the chief of the Honduran armed forces, a man the CIA depended on in conducting its not-so-secret war against Nicaragua.

Nicaragua is the CIA's most controversial operation, one in which the agency is not just spying, but actually trying to do harm to an unfriendly government, at one point even going so far as to mine its harbors.

There are scores of these covert operations going on around the world, ranging from support for dissidents opposed to Libya's Muammar Qaddafi, to arming of guerrillas fighting Soviet troops in Afghanistan. Covert operations have increased not only in number, but also in size.

HUDDLESTON: They involve many, many people, and also carry with them a considerable amount of risk if they are revealed, either the life of individuals or to the reputation and credibility of the United States.

MARTIN: Congress watches the CIA much more closely than it used to. But that alone does not guaranty successful operations. That will depend on the quality of the people coming into the CIA and on the ability of whatever Administration is in power to make good use of the intelligence the CIA provides.

CBS

Tuesday, June 17, 1985 -- B-9

FROM THE PENTAGON

Rather: Right now, the U.S. government is taking a diplomatic approach to ending the hijack hostage drama, but the military option is being kept open.

CBS's David Martin: A three-ship amphibious task force is the latest unit to cut short a port call, this one in Gibraltar, and head east toward Lebanon. The aircraft carrier Nimitz is now within range of the Beirut airport and a ship believed to be the guided missile destroyer Kidd can be seen through the haze. The Kidd's real value may be as a source of intelligence. Ships of that class are outfitted with an electronic eavesdropping system, code-named "Classic Outboard," which could detect communications in and around the airport. Intelligence on the whereabouts of the hostages is in very short supply. Government sources say the U.S. has an almost total lack of agents on the ground in Beirut. The same thing happened during the Iranian hostage crisis, when the U.S. was left without any agents in the country after the embassy was sieged. AS a result of that failure, a secret Army organization, called the Intelligence Support Activity, was created to infiltrate native-speaking agents into countries like Lebanon where Americans are not able to move around. The suicide bombing of the Marine compound dramatized in gruesome fashion the lack of good on-the-ground intelligence in Lebanon. An investigation determined that a shortage of agents had made it impossible to check out the scores of reports of impending terrorist attacks. Now, a year-and-a-half later, sources close to the Intelligence Support Activity say it still has not sent any agents into Lebanon. That same investigation also recommended that the Joint Chiefs of Staff develop a "broad range of appropriate military responses to terrorism." If the Joint Chiefs have developed those responses, they have yet to demonstrate them. (CBS-4)

Jennings: For all of the talk on the subject, there appears to be little the United States can do in the way of direct action to resolve the crisis in Beirut. Still, some American military units have been moved into position where they can be seen if not felt.

ABC's Dean Reynolds: The nuclear-powered aircraft carrier U.S.S. Nimitz, accompanied by other warships, including the cruiser South Carolina and the guided-missile destroyer Kidd shouldered into position today off the coast of Lebanon -- the Kidd so close it could be observed from the control tower at Beirut airport. It was a show of sea and air strength by the U.S. Sixth Fleet. More importantly, it provided what experts said would be a base for a rescue -- or retaliation. At the same time, the U.S.S. Spartanburg County and other ships in the Mediterranean amphibious force headed methodically eastward toward Lebanon from Gibraltar, with 1800 Marines aboard. Navy officials acknowledged the amphibious force could be used to secure the beach for a military mission. That mission could be carried out by elite commandos, known as the Delta Force, a unit that sources said was assembled during the weekend for use in the Middle East. Because its mission is secret, the Pentagon won't say how large the force is, where or if it might be deployed. But people could die in a military action and there are other problems. (continued)

-more-