INTRODUCTION

The Key Intelligence Questions for Fiscal Year 1977, issued by the Director of Central Intelligence pursuant to his responsibilities in Executive Order 11905, represent a departure from past practice dictated by experience. The new list is short and highly selective, the questions having been chosen not only because they are important to national consumers, but also because a real need for action by the Intelligence Community exists and because action seems likely to produce results. The KIQs represent the DCI's guidance to all Intelligence Community collection and production managers on these selected subjects.

The Key Intelligence Questions continue to be formulated by the National Intelligence Officers in consultation with intelligence producers and consumers. The primary purpose of the KIQs is to improve intelligence production and collection by providing a highly selective list of current, critical questions for a period of special operational attention. The purposeful limitation on the number of questions and their high degree of focus required that difficult choices had to be made from the many current high priority areas and questions. This meant that certain issues or problems, although very important, have been excluded. The estimated duration of an issue was also used as a factor in the question selection process. For example, if a problem were considered likely to pass before a strategy for solving it could be devised, it was excluded. Moreover, key problems of a critical nature which currently receive substantial and ongoing attention, such as SAL and verification, were not included in the questions.

The National Intelligence Officers will produce brief and succinct KIQ Strategy Reports aimed at developing special collection and analytical strategies. The performance of the Intelligence Community on the KIQs will be evaluated as part of a regular Intelligence Community Staff program which assesses the timeliness and quality of intelligence products in terms of the requirements of major users.

The KIQs and their performance evaluations cannot provide systematic inputs for resource allocation decisions by program managers due to their limited number, specificity, and emphasis on current operations. However, they can provide valuable insights for programming and planning. It is important to note that the KIQs do not derive their priorities from those appearing in the attachment to DCID 1/2, "U.S. Foreign Intelligence Priorities for Fiscal Years 1979-83." Broad national intelligence planning priorities are based on a perspective of the foreign environment for the planning period and not on current operational needs.

Additions, deletions, or modifications to the Key Intelligence Questions may be issued from time to time during FY 77, depending on major changes in the international situation or if the foreign intelligence environment should dictate. The order in which the FY 77 questions are listed should not be regarded as implying an internal priority: by definition all the Key Intelligence Questions are of major importance, and are singled out for special operational attention.
