

A simpler schematic reveals that the old structure persists if you understand that the National Foreign Assessment Center is a community name for the Directorate of Intelligence. The former U.S. Intelligence Board, advisory to the CIA on National Intelligence Estimates and other community policies, is now called National Foreign Intelligence Board (NFIB). It is still made up of chiefs of all the intelligence components of the government.

The complexity of the system of interlocking and overlapping intelligence activities is apparent in this chart of the many agencies coordinated by the Director of Central Intelligence in 1981.
