depict the Nationalist campaign as Communist-inspired.

The colonial government has received local support so far only from the Communists and the Turkish minority. The Greek majority on Cyprus appears to be solidly behind the Nationalist agitation. The clandestine Greek Communist radio in Bucharest and official Greek broadcasts, on the other hand, have warned all Cypriots against violence.

Although Cypriot archbishop Makarios, who heads the Nationalist movement, formerly opposed violence, his representative in Athens is now reported to favor it because of its effectiveness in publicizing the movement. The archbishop plans to attend the Afro-Asian conference. He probably expects to encourage discussion of the Cyprus issue there.

Makarios may fear that Athens is wavering in its support of the Cypriot Nationalist cause and he may covertly support the campaign as a means of bringing pressure to bear on Greece. Unless Makarios actively combats Nationalist violence, it is likely to continue sporadically.
