SECRET: NO FORESTEE DISSEM

Introduction and Summary

What happens whn the KBB* has a high level penetration of a Western intelligence service? How does the KBB exploit the voluminous information received on enemy operations, while at the same time protecting the security of its source? More importantly, does the KBB handling of such an agent leave tell-tale signs which would permit an alert and knowledgeable Western counter-intelligence officer to surmise the existence of such a penetration? It would be presumptuous to generalize on the basis of one case, but study of the KBB handling of Heinz Felfe may have provide some marght.

of the identified NGB penetrations of Western intelligence and security services, Reinz Felfe was certainly one of the most successful. Felfe was an officer of the West German Foreign intelligence Service (BND) for ten years, six of them as deputy chief of the section responsible among other things for countering Soviet espionage. He was a dedicated Soviet agent throughout this period, and remained loyal to the Soviets even after his arrest in November 1961. He was detected as a result of a lead provided by a CIA-run penetration of the Polish Intelligence Service (UB).

Felfe was more than a simple penetration agent; he became, in effect, a consultant to the KSB on many of its operations in West Germany. Through Felfe, the Soviets pursued three objectives:

a. To protect the security of Soviet installations and personnel

^{*} For convenience, the term KIB will be used throughout this paper, even though during part of the period comered the proper terminology for the State Security Service was MGB or MVD.

From 1947 to 1956, when it had no legal status, this was known as the Gehlen Organization. In 1956, after West Germany had regained its sovereignty, it became the BRD, which is the German abbreviation For Federal Intelligence Service. For convenience and simplicity it is frequently referred to as the BRD even with the earlier period is meant.

in West Germany and in East Germany, and to detect Western operations inside the Soviet Union. To this end, the KGB ran deception operations designed to expand Felfe's access to information not only from his own service, but also from other West German and Allied services including CIA.

- b. To confuse, discrient and discredit the West German foreign intelligence service. The aim was not only to penetrate the service, but to manipulate it to serve Soviet interests.
- c. To collect political intelligence on West Germany.

 This goal, and the equally important objective of political disinformation, assumed increasing importance as the case progressed and may have ultimately become the most important in Soviet eyes, as a support to Soviet foreign policy objectives.

The reader will not find here a complete history of the Felfe case; that would require a much larger volume. The broad lines of the story are here, and one chapter in particular is devoted primarily to background information, presenting the dramatis personac. By describes how the KUB recruited first Hans Clemens, and then, thru Clemens, Felfe. They had been colleagues in Masi intelligence during the war, motivated after the war by revenge against the Americans, money, and a desire to be on what they considered the most poverful side. But this is essentially a selective and interpretive account, for the purpose of illustrating MAB methods of handling and supporting a well-place staff penetration of a Western service. The lessons to be learned lie in the various deception and diversionary operations run by the KSB to build up Felfe s reputation in the BHD, expand his access, protect his security, and create an illusion that the German service was effectively fulfilling its CE mission, while the Soviets were generally ineffective.

There are many ways by which Felfe might have been unmasked earlier than he was. Even a thorough namecheck might have done weight the trick. He could also have been caught earlier if more yield had been given to analytical evidence which clearly indicated something was amiss, rather then waiting to be spurred to action by a report from our own sensitive penetration source. Indications of Soviet penetration of the HMD were to be found in the deception and diversionary operations run by the KUB for the express purpose of supporting or protecting Felfe. Although support and protection of penetration agents in Western services is not the only reason the Soviets run deception and diversionary operations, it sappears to be one of several she principal reasons for such operations. Study of the Felfe case suggests that when a number of Soviet deception and diversionary operations are concentrated in one area, or should be to be carefully analyzed against one service, these operations m to determine whether they indicate Soviet penetration in that area or that service. Many examples of deception and diversionary operations are discussed in detail in this study; the most important are summarized in the following paragraphs.

The first KWB deception operation in support of Felfe was the "RALMERASAR" case. As far as the EMD knew at the time, BALMERASAR was one of its better positive intelligence operations, producing information on Soviet mining of uranium in East German and its shipment to the USSR. The agent BALMERASAR was a wartime friend of Clemens who had re-initiated contact with him and then allowed himself to be recruited by Clemens for the EMD. Actually, BALMERASARwas a KGB agent from the beginning. The KGB initiated the operation to provide Felfers co-conspirator, Clemens, with an official reason for repeated trips to West Berlin (to meet BALMERASAR), from where he could easily cross to East Berlin to meet with his and Felfers KGB case officer.

Another deception operation, the so-called "LEMA" case was the most important single contribution to Felfe's career as a West German intelligence officer, and probably also to his career as a Soviet agent. It gave him status and stature within the BHD, and maneuverability as a Soviet agent. It was the vehicle for many gambits to broaden Felfe's access to collect information, especially political information, and sometimes to disseminate disinformation.

LENA was the BND cryptonym for an East German political functionary and publisher. He travelled frequently to West Germany, where he was well received in certain West German socialist circles as an apparently independent, outspoken East German. His role as a BND agent, doubled by the KGB, goes back to the early fifties. But in January 1954, shortly after Felfe's assignment to the BND Headquarters CE Group, LENA suddenly turned from what had been (from the German point of view) a positive intelligence operation into a CE case. LENA reported to the BMD that he had been introduced to a KGB officer, and that after a flurry of meetings he had been formally recruited by the Soviets and immediately assigned the task of creating a net of agents to produce information on the West German Foreign Office and the Chancellor's Office. The Soviet plan, as related by LENA, was highly ambitious. LENA was to be the "German net director," to recruit two principal agents, a political advisor and spotter, several support agents, and to provide names of potential penetration agents. As a developing CE case, handling of LENA was then transferred to the CE Group, where the newly arrived Felfe became the Headquarters case officer. His assignment to this case was probably not accidental: Felfe's immediate superior at the time was almost certainly another KGB penetration of the BND. With KGB assistance, LENA developed rapidly into the BND's most important CE case, and it made Felfe's reputation as an authority on Soviet counterespionage.

LENA's talkative KGB case officers revealed information on other Soviet operations in West Germany, compromising several bona fide Soviet and East German agents in the process. LENA was "such an intelligent man" that his KGB case officers ostensibly enjoyed talking politics with him, and these long conversations revealed occasional glimpses of the "true" Soviet policy on Germany. On the surface, LENA's operation to penetrate the KGB on behalf of the EMD was far more successful that the Soviet operation using LEMA to penetrate the Bonn Government. Although LEMA reported many potential recruits to the KUB, the only real penetration actually recruited was an ailing and incompetent gentlemen in the Press Office, who contented himself with the product of waste baskets as his source material. To some observers it seemed incredible at the time that the KBB should go through so many motions just for this. There was created an impression of KGB incompetence, and KGB failure to obtain important information from West German government offices.* At the same time, LENA was passing the BMD detailed and comprehensive information on personnel and installations at the KOB's East German Readquarters in Karlshorst. So that this information could continue, Felfe decided it was necessary to provide the KDB with build-up material to keep LEMA's faltering West German net alive. For this purpose, Felfe pioneered procedures within the West German government for the clearance of build-up material. He obtained from the Federal Attorney General a statement that any material already demonstrably known to the opposition was automatically no longer secret. By extension, that which was no longer secret could be passed to the opposition as build-up material. Thus when a KGB case officer told LENA, or any other double agent reporting to the HND, that certain areas of information were already covered by the KGB, Felfe could argue the virtue of providing this information to LENA as build-up, to satisfy presumed KEB cross-checking, or to smoke out the presumed Soviet source. In this way, Felfe was able to maneuver a wide variety of information "legally" into Soviet hands. Discussion within the West German government of What could and could not be cleared for passage in response to Soviet requirements greatly broadened Felfe's access to positive intelligence otherwise inaccessible to him: information which could not be cleared for passage as build-up material was passed clandestinely by Felfe.

The LENA case also provided Felfe -- and the MSB -- with a resdy-made mechanism for investigating West German personalities of target interest to MSB. The MSB case office would instruct Soviet interest then provided Felfe with cover for namechecking the official in West German and Allied files. The results went to the KGB directly, through Felfe's own clandestine communications channels, and at a later meeting LENA would report that his KGB case officer was no longer interested. To make this exercise more thorough, Felfe eventually arranged permission not just to namecheck the West German targets of interest to LENA's KGB handler, but to conduct his own detailed investigation of them. Felfe argued that if the KGB was interested in certain West German officials and was seaking vulnerability data on them, then it was necessary in order to protect West German security for the BND to conduct its own investigation of these persons to determine if they were in fact vulnerable to Soviet recruitment. This was done, with the results of investigation passed by Felfe to the KGB.

The LENA operation also helped Felfe break ground for liaison between the BND and CIA Berlin Base concerning operations against Soviet installations in East Berlin. BND information on these installations had been checked in Berlin Base files since 1954, but in 1953 Felfe began a concerted campaign to collect detailed information from CIA on its operational program to penetrate KGB Headquarters in Karlshorst. The urgency of KGB attention to Berlin Base as a CI target was heightened by the arrest in late 1958 of a CIA penetration of Soviet military intelligence in East Germany (Lt. Col. Popov) run at the time from Berlin Base. Two years earlier, CIA's Berlin tunnel operation had been detected, as well as an apparently successful CIA attempt to recruit a member of an RU GSFG* intelligence point in East Berlin. It was clear to the KGB that CIA's Berlin Base represented a major threat to its security.

safe houses, and license and telephone numbers in the Karlshorst Headquarters compound. This information was then checked against information available to CIA Berlin Base, with the results going back to Felfe -- and to the KGB. LENA also met a number of KGB officers under their full true name, and these too were nametraced by Felfe with friendly services, providing the KGB with a mechanism for nametracing some of their personnel in CIA files. In addition to LENA. the KGB created other operations producing information on Karlshorst Headquarters, and arranged for these operations to fall under Felfe's jurisdiction. Through manipulation of these operations, and his personal role in engineering a number of crises in CIA-BND relationships. Felfe was able to force a reluctant Berlin Base to give him a general briefing on the status of CIA operations against Karlshorst. Over a period of several years, Felfe, with the assistance of KGB operations, was able to achieve ever-closer BND-CIA cooperation in operations against Karlshorst. In one case when he - or the KGB - suspected CIA had an agent in an East Berlin housing office, Felfe, with KGB assistance, boldly provoked confirmation of this fact by trying to recruit one of our agent's colleagues. He placed an ad in a West Berlin newspaper designed to attract secretarial help from the East Sector. Our agent's secretary answered the ad (at KGB behest), and Felfe informed us that he intended to recruit her as a source. We then told him that we already employed her chief and asked him to stop his approach since it might endanger our agent. As a result of such activity by Felfe and the KGB, the hitherto unilateral Berlin Base program against Karlshorst was compromised.

There were also other cases of provocation to identify CIA agents. One involved was a West German businessman, recruited by Berlin Base to report on Soviet trade contacts, then approached by the KGB and targeted against the West German and U.S. Embassies in Moscow. He was suspected by the KGB of Western intelligence contacts. Therefore, the KGB closed out all the agent's KGB requirements except one, namely to spot, recruit and maneuver into place a West German girl suitable to be a German Embassy secretary. By introducing a CE factor urgently affecting German security, the KGB succeeded not only in forcing revelation of the case to the BND, but an actual turnover of the case to the BND, with Felfe becoming the BMD Headquarters case officer. In another case, a West German woman run by CIA, Felfe provoked revelation of our interest by sending us reports ascusing her of seriously insecure what we behavior while in Moscow. Subsequently, she became the object of A K68-ducted who appeared the Washington operation -- a Soviet lover, when the MED introduced and make the many potentially recruitable.

Another integral part of the Felfe case is the LILLI MARLEN" operation, which occurred in 1954, and the related case of Ludwig Albert the following year. LILLI MARLEN is the German cryptonym for a Soviet operation which involved the intentional compromise by the KEB of the fact that it had a source in the BED field base for CE operations.* To carry out this operation, the KGB prepared a comprehensive report on the personnel, organization and some of the operations of the BMD field base. In June 1954, a KIB agent was sent to place this report in a deaddrop in West Germany. A second KGB agent was then sent to confirm that the drop was in place, then go to the local police and recite a pre-arranged story of observing a man hide something at this spot. (This agent was subsequently arrested and confessed his role in the deception.) Three days later, a third KBB agent was dispatched on a mission to "recover" the drop, with the intention that he unwittingly walk into a police stakeout and be arrested. The KWB judged (correctly) that this particular agent would quickly confess to being dispatched by the KOB, thus confirming KOB control of the "penetration." Through astate police work, the operation was unmasked as a Soviet deception, but the fact remained that the Soviets did have a complete and accurate rundown on the activitées of this field base and must therefore have actually had a penetration reporting this information. Subsequent investigation, in which Felfe played an important role, centered on identification of this agent. The report itself provided several class and KGB provocation agent. mounted a veek after the report was found may have been designed to provide additional clues pointing to Ludwig Albert, a senior officer of this base, but the provocation was ineffective. SECRET East German soulet agent, It carnot be proven that this "confession" was Soviet inspired, but circumstantial evidence suggests this was the case. Albert was arrested and later committed suicide; evidence found in his home confirmed the alignment him.

Although there are gaps in our knowledge and hard evidence is lacking, the KGB purpose in the LILLI MARIEN and Albert cases appears to have been three-fold: First, initial impetus for LILLI MARLEN may have come from the defection of KBB officer Petr Deryabin. Deryabin had served in the German CE branch in KGB Headquarters and was partially knowledgeable of KUB operations against the HMD.* The LILLI MARIEN operation, which came just four months after Deryabin's defection, may well have been designed to divert Western investigation of his information. By creating circumstances and feeding information which eventually led to the arrest of Albert, the KWB apparently hoped to shield a more important or more reliable agent, Felfe, from investigation. A second purpose may positely elimination of Albert who, although East Derman an actual forciet agent, had apparently become dispensable to the There are several possible explanations for this. them relates to the fact that Albert had become a bitter enemy of Felfe and had accused Felfe of being a Soviet agent), werhaps. the Mill arms no longer certain of Albert's total toyelty. As the years passed, and the Hill developed greater experience with the penetration sources, the deception operations became increasingly complex. The BALTHASAR operation was followed by the increasingly complicated LENA and LILLI MARLEN cases, discussed above. The final deception was the BECH case, which aborted in mid-plot as a result of Felfe's arrest in 1961. seems to have been This was a convoluted triple-think, a plot within a plot, which is far too complicated to summarize here. in Chapter IV. Its purpose may have been to facilitate communications files on BND personnel, with Felfe or some other agent within the BND, or to deceive the BND orto support an operation with some other KGB agent in the BND, about its own security, but since the operation ended prematurely the KGB rationale and specific objectives are by no means clear. Felfe exposed himself to many risks to get the operation started, so it must have been destined for an important role.

BALTHASAR, LENA, LILLI MARLEN and BUSCH are all cases run on Soviet initiative for the purpose of improving communications, increasing the access of Feife, and/or other panetration, or otherwise deceiving the BND. There is also an entirely different category of cases which merits study. These are apparently clean operations, primarily double agent operations, initiated by some West German service. Awhich took curious turns after their compromise by Felfe. Two of these, ZUVERSICHT and MERKATOR, are described in annexes to this paper. ZUVERSICHT was an RU GSFG operation and MERKATOR an East German foreign intelligence (MfS/HVA) operation, both initially doubled by the BfV.* They are selected from among many such cases because in these two instances we have confirmation from Lt. Col. Popov and an East German MfS/HVA defector (Max Heim) that the KGB informed the handling services that their agents had been doubled by the West Germans. The KGB specifically asked the RU and HVA to neither drop nor re-double these agents, but to continue running them for source protection or deception purposes. We know the date this happened and can trace the change in handling which occurred after this date. In the case of ZUVERSICHT, the RU continued running the case for four more years, but devoted minimum effort to carrying out the KGB instruction to keep the case alive. Because of this minimum effort, RU communications with ZUVERSICHT became more and more "insecure," from the agent's point of view. Felfe used this case to help create the impression within the BND that the RU GSFG is generally an incompetent organization. The MERKATOR case, however, illustrates more imaginative use of an agent known to be controlled by the opposition. When the KGB advised the HVA that MERKATOR was a double agent, responsibility for the case within MfS/HVA Headquarters was transferred to a CI component which apparently also handled other cases known to be controlled by Museum Landling of the case indicates their equation. Western services. Thereeforth, the objective of East Serman handling became to disseminate political disinformation, to observe West German CE handling of a double agent, and to divert West German counterintelligence by creating suspicion of an afficial the West German political intelligence by creating suspicion of an afficial the West German political.

A fascinating example of KGB exploitation of such an opposition-controlled double agent is the Sokolov case. This started as a U. S. Army CIC double agent operation. The case officer on the Soviet and of the operation was an RU GSFG Major (who used the alias Sokolov) in East Germany. In 1959, after several uneventful years. C IC turned the case over to the BfV. BfV study of the case revealed that Sokolov was a drunkard, an insecure talker, and a flamboyant and promiscuous type. Further investigation revealed he was known to various Western services under various allases. At this point the operation apparently became known to the KGB, whether through Felfe or some other penetration is not known. and it took an interest in exploiting the case. The purpose was probably primarily investigation of an insecure and possibly treasonous RU officer (Sokolov), but in the course of its investigation the KGB pursued a secondary objective. This was to promote, and then to monitor -- with Felfe in the middle -- a tour de force of interservice liaison. The method used by the KGB was to create or elaborate upon existing double agent operations involving Sokolov, so as to provoke operational interest in him and in his agent networks in West Germany on the part of the BfV, two LfV's,* the BND and CIA (on its own and in its capacity as liaison representative for CIC and OSI interests). From the Western point of view, the case eventually came to involve several interrelated double agent operations which resulted in investigation of roughly 200 security suspects, a seemingly excellent operational lead to an RU Major (Sokolov) in East Germany, and the participation of nearly every German and American intelligence and security service in West Germany. By inserting into BND spotting channels an agent who claimed to be Sokolov's mistress as well as his agent, and who hinted that he might be recruitable, the KGB maneuvered the BND (and Felfe) into a controlling position in the operation. The BND inspired an interservice task force to work on this case; a CIA liaison officer worked full time, for six months, exclusively on this case. CIA provided traces, guidance, and information on RIS modus operandi and organization.

Felfe's behavior on the task force was uncharacteristically passive -the case was pursued in the direction he (and the KGB) desired without his customary railing at the incompetence of his colleagues, although during one period he did try to persuade the task force to try to recruit Sokolov in place rather than defect him. But most of the time. Felfe simply sat back and allowed himself to be briefed by all participants. The executive action phase of the operation proceeded smoothly: five RU agents arrested, many more suspects identified, considerable espionage equipment, including one of the newest Scylet W/T sets, captured. The West German services were very pleased with their "success." CIA was impressed by the proof that close operational liaison with the German services could be effective and amicable. But the KGB was also very pleased, and Felfe w even received a rare cash bonus for his work. The KGB achieved the probable arrest of Sokolov and obtained a wealth of information on the operational and liaison procedures of Western services. Only the RU was left out in the cold. Felfe's co-conspirator, Clemens, who was slower and less sophisticated than Felfe, was shocked that the KGB deliberately allowed an RU agent from East Germany to walk into a West German trap and be arrested. Felfe was merely amused.

In Summary, the Soviets achieved through their various deception operations a far broader exploitation of Felfe than would normally be considered possible.

By rigging an operation especially for Felfe, the KGB could the answers from the second elements of the West German government in the guise of build-up material.

- 12 -

By having double agents report Soviet interest in certain individuals, Felfe was provided with a cover for namechecking them with other West German and Allied agencies. By creating various operational situations and complexities, the KGB could help Felfe in his bureaucratic manipulations, indest even promote the formulation of Market become ratio regularizers or presedentes. By introducing a Soviet CE factor into any EMD case anywhere, the MSB could cause the case to be transferred to the protective custody of Felfe. By introducing a Soviet CE factor urgently affecting German security into the operation of any other agency, German or foreign, the KGB could hope to bring many enother case under Felf's scrutiny. When this valuable and versatile source was endangered by the defection of a KBB officer able to report on KBB penetration of Might the BBD, the KBB protect Felfe's security by mounting a deception operation which confirmed the existence of penetration and which was probably intended to divert the investigation to a scapagnat selected by the KBB.

There are certain common denominators which run through all the major deception operations discussed in this study. These are as follows:

- a. In pursuit of the above objectives, the KUB was willing to sacrifice agents (their own as well as GRU, RU and East German agents), case officer time, money, good information, and apparently new equipment and procedures.
- b. The KEB had a well-placed penetration, Felfe, in a position to monitor the target service's reaction to and handling of each deception. Frequently, this penetration benefited from the deception.
- at times grandiose in their conception and planning, but their execution was frequently inept by comparison. They worked only because of the naiveté of many BED officers and the rigid compartmentation within the BED, which in this case was a disadvantage as it prevented pieces of the puzzle from coming together in one place. Quite a few CIA officers in limison with the BED felt at the time that these operations were "peculiar." The CIA plantson officer responsible for BED security during part of the period in question frankly thought they "smelled" and were indicative of penetration.

Perticularly in the light of current knowledge of KEB modus operand; (including this study of the Felfe case), it is quite possible for an alert CI officer to detect such deception and diversionary operations.

The source meterial for this paper is voluminous and varied. Even though Felfe never confessed to enything more than could be demonstrably proved against him, some of his statements have been helpful. He was supported throughout his agent career by two other agents who have been more frank and whose testimony has been found generally reliable. These agents were less important and less knowledgeable than Felfe, but their information has been useful in reconstructing the case. CIA had intimate limison with the BND and BrV concerting the operations discussed in this paper and was directly involved in several of them. Additional insight into BND handling of these cases was received unofficially through close personal contacts with several of the HID officers. This includes information on disagreements within the HMD concerning the interpretation and handling of these operations, and the exact role played by Felfe in the intra-service maneuvering. In several instances we know the facts from defectors or from a CIA-controlled penetration source. CIA was also intimately involved inthe investigation of Felfe both before the after his arrest. Thus, while there are some gaps in our information, our knowledge of this period of intelligence history in Germany is probably almost as complete as it ever could be without a full confession by Felfe or a first-hand account from his Miss case officer.

II. Soviet Operations Against the Gehlen Organization in the Early Post-War Years

The history of the Felfe penetration has its beginning in the early post-wer years. The spotting of people like Heinz Felfe by the Soviet intelligence services was not accidental, but the result of a well-targeted, well-developed recruitment campaign directed against former police and intelligence officers of the Mazi Reich. The theses was simple: old intelligence hands will flock together, will seek to return to the work they know best. Some ofthese people might be susceptible to a Soveet approach because of their general sympathies. Others, such as former former Elite Guard (SS)+ and Security Service (SB) members, many of whom were now war criminals able to make their way only by hiding a past which had once jut them smong the elite, would be vulnerable to blackmail. The Seviet spotters were to be found almost everywhere in Europe - Fast and West - in the POW camps, in the war crimes screening commissions, in the courtrooms. The future West German intelligence and security services could be penetrated almost even befor they were created.

In the closing days of the war, General Reinhard Gehlen of the Frende Heere Ost (FHO) had brought the remnants of his files and personnel to G-2, U.S. Army, for whom he presented a valuable and relatively unique source of information on Soviet order-of-battle. Under G-2's edgis his group burgeoned until by 1949 it had become recognized as the primary Western agency for the collection of Soviet CB and eventually of CI information in the Soviet occupied zone of Germany. It was a loosely knit organization made up predominantly of former military intelligence (Abwahr) and FHO officers who were held together by the officer's code of honor and individual bonds of friendship. From an institutional point of view, however, the problems of control, responsibility and security were serious. Problems of control, responsibility and security were serious. To the outsider and to its enemies, the Gehlen Organization looked much more like an American puppet than it actually was.

In 1948, the KCE in East Germany heldeved an important coup against the Genten Organization. Gehlen's chief of sperations for northeastern Germany was arrested (or defected) in fast Berlin, and, on the basis of Information provided by him the Soviets were able to expend and intensify their penetration offerts. By mid-1952, the work against various of Gehlen's field bases had been successful, but an agent working on Soviet operations inside the headquarters organization in Pullach was reportedly still lacking.* Particularly successful had been the KGB work against Gehlen's field base for CE and CI operations which was located in Karlsruhe. Within the Gehlen Organization this base was designated as GV"L". and it will be referred to by that designation throughout this paper. GY"L" was especially attractive to the KGB. The major part of its work involved the recruitment and handling of informants in other German agencies for the ostensible purpose of protecting the security of these agencies. The same base was also responsible for running double agent operations against the Soviets, a function which brought its personnel into direct contact with Soviet controlled agents. It was especially vulnerable because it was heavily staffed by former SD and SS personnel who in order to maintain their jobs were obliged at least proforma to conceal their background, and who still suffered to some extent from old social and professional caste rivalries which kept the former Abwehr and FHO officers in ascendency. In reaction to this situation there had gradually

He read the Headquarters file on the Gehlen Organization in July 1952 and has stated that as of that date there were Soviet agents in the field bases but no evidence of a Soviet agent in the Gehlen headquarters; however, we cannot rule out the possibility that there may have existed restricted files to which he had no access. This group was particularly susceptible both to simple blackmail and to the somewhat more complicated appeals of revenge or vindication.* It was through this base, GV"L", that one of the most able and tonacious staff penetrations of the achieve Organization was launched.

a. Background Information on Felfe

Heinz Felfe was born in Dresden in 1918, the son of a criminal police inspector. He started his own police career at the age of 13 as a volunteer in a border unit. In 1938 he was inducted into an SS reserve unit, and from then on his schooling, legal training, and subsequent assignment to a job in the Criminal Police was guided and fostered by the SS. In 1943 he went into the foreign intelligence section of the Reich Central Security Office (RSHA), where he worked first in the Swiss section at headquarters, then in Holland - for a while under Schreieder of "Nordpol" fame. He finished the war as a 1st Lt. (Obersturmfuehrer) in the militarized branch of the Nazi Elite Guard (Waffen SS) and as a prisoner of the British. He was an average looking individual with no distinguishing physical characteristics. Of the many recorded impressions of him from various stages of his career, certain personality traits dominate: a highly intelligent man with very little personal warmth; a person with a high regard for efficiency, and for authority, but susceptible to flattery; venal; and capable of almost childish displays of vindictiveness. Naturally a devious person, he enjoyed the techniques of engineering a

^{*}A variety of formal and informal secret Nazi organizations have existed since the end of the Second World War. The KGB has had much success in penetrating and controlling these groups from their inception, and using them as recruitment pools and as propaganda weapons. One of the most interesting reports on this subject was provided by the senior Polish Intelligence (UE) officer Michal Goleniewski, and concerns an organization which he called HACKE. Information on HACKE is in Annex A. It shows how early and how thoroughly the KGB penetrated and manipulated hard-core flazi groups, especially the former intelligence and security officers. These operations were the logical outgrowth of the KGB's wartime operations and began even before the war was over. They still have ramifications in areas of the world where former Nazishave settled.

Felfe was the "ice-cold calculator" as he once admiringly described his favorite agent. The only kindly emotions detectable in him are his interest, enjoyment of the game and his disdain for his fellow man. These, together with his great admiration for Soviet power and efficiency, seem to have sustained him throughout his career and imprisonment. His attachment to his wife and two children seems to have been relatively perfunctory. As for his colleague in espionage for ten years - and friend in adversity of even longer standing, Hams Clamens - Felfe found him in the end merely a convenient scapegoat.

As a British POW, Felfe was interned at Blauw Kappel, an interrogation center near Utrecht, which specialized in the interrogation of former German intelligence personnel. It is possible that his name came to Soviet attention through an agent among the Dutch interrogators. One of Felfe's fellow-prisoners, a former SD officer named Helmut Proebsting, reported to Dutch authorities in 1946 that he and Felfe had been approached by Max Weesel, of the interrogators, to work for the Soviets. But Felfe denied that any such incident had occurred, when confronted with this information after his arrest. This is one of a number of suspicious points in Felfe's background which could have been uncovered by an aggressive investigation long before his arrest.

Felfe returned from the war in Nomember 1946 with the determination to settle in the Western zone of Germany, although his home had consistently been in Drusden, which is the Soviet occupied zone. His wife and child joined him at the end of the year. Seven difficult months followed until he finally found work as an agent for a British military intelligence unit (Sixth Area Intelligence Office, BAOR). His task was to develop information on Communist student groups at the University of Bonn. Under British instruction he settled himself in the Bonn area, registered in the Faculty of Law and joined the Communist Party (KPD). In the course of his work he made several trips to East Berlin and to East Germany to observe student rallies, from which he took off on his own initiative to visit his mother in Dresden. Here again the possibility of Soviet targeting edicts. Felfe says that on one of these trips, in 1948, his mother warned him that someone in the town had recognized him and reported him as a former SS officer. On another occasion, he says, he was arrested by tell police, but quickly released at the intervention of his host, an official of the East German Ministry of Public Education.

The British finally dropped Felfe in April 1950 for serious operational and personal security reasons, none of which unfortunately, came to the attention of the Gehlen Organization in any very detailed or forceful form until long after Felfe was entrenched in it. British files on Felfe were received by the BND in 1961 and by CIA in 1962. These revealed that early complaints against Felfe included attempts to sell information collected for the British to several other intelligence agencies, two West German news services and to the East German Socialist Unity (i.e., Communist) Party (SED). They also contained an account of Felfe's attempt to involve the British in a double agent operation with the Soviets, as well as various agent reports showing that he had blown himself as a British agent to all and sundry, including the West German Communist Party he was supposed to be penetrating, and that he was guilty in general of "sharp practice" and "varnishing of the truth." As specific grounds for dismissal, the British told Felfe that his refusal to give up undesirable contacts with former SS personnel could no longer be tolerated. Specifically. they named Helmut Proebsting and Hans Clemens. Clemens was an old Dresden friend and former colleague from the foreign intelligence arm of the RSHA.

After leaving the British, Felfe continued to work against the West German Communist Party for the Land security office (LfV) in Nordrhein-Westfallen, to which he had already been reporting on the side while a British military intelligence agent. He incurred the wrath of this organization on at least two serious counts: for having sent a report on it to a contact in East Germany; and for having tried to peddle the plans for the BfV charter, which he had somehow acquired from someone in the Finance Ministry, to a West German newsman. From the LfV Felfe went to the Ministry for All-German Affairs,* where he worked as an interrogator specializing in refugees knowledgeable on the East German People's Police (VOPO). He remained at this job, eventually writing a study of the VOPO for the Ministry until his recruitment into the Gehlen Organization in 1951.

b. Background Information on Clemens

Anyone who has tried to understand Germany knows that bonds of common local origin are often far stronger than the larger national concept. The fellowship of former Dresdeners is a thread which runs very heavily throughout this story. Both Hans Clemens and Felfe were from Dresden, and their recruitment by Soviet intelligence was directed by the KGB office in Dresden.

Clemens had been chief of an SD field office in Dresden in the late thirties, when he had worked against the German Communist Party (KPD). Later he was posted to RSHA Amt VI (foreign intelligence), where he learned to know Felfe well, and subsequently he went to the SD command in Rome. At the end of the war he was captured by Italian partisans and interned in various British and U.S. POW camps. In 1948 he was indicted, and acquitted, during the well-publicized trial of his chief, the Nazi Police Attache Herbert Kappler, notorious for the murder of Italian hostages in the Ardeatine Caves. At some point during his captivity he learned that his wife Gerda, in Dresden, with whom he had been corresponding, had been sleeping with Soviet officers. He claimed that this knowledge severed his already weakened affections for her and decided him in favor of resettling in West rather than East Germany after his release from POW camp. He settled in West Germany in October 1949, but continued to remain in loose correspondence with his wife, through whom he had learned the whereabouts of some of his old friends. One of these was Erwin Tiebel, a fellow-Dresdener then practising law quietly in a small town in the Rhineland. Tiebel had at one time been a confidential informant for Clemens in the Dresden SD. Later, he had been assigned to the Swiss Dask of RSHA VI, where he had also known Felfe. He was to become a support agent for Clemens and Felfe in their work for the Soviets.

Felfe had already looked up Tiebel in 1947. Clemens wrote to him from

- 20a -

POW camp in 1948 or 1949 and arranged to meet him after his release. A letter from Clamens' wife dated Dresden, March 1949, addressed to the Felfe family and mentioning Tiebel, suggests that these old threads were knotted very soon after the war, with KiB cognizance. Tiebel was on a list of war criminals accused of killing hostages in Dresden, and there is some suggestion that Clamens was similarly listed. Gerda Clamens was working as a Sowiet agent at least by December 1949, and probably had been since the end of the war, as Felfe later told his British case officer. Her cover name was "Brika". She reported to a KiB Colonel called "Max" in an office in the Soviet Command, Dresden, which, according to Clamens, was concerned with tracking down former police and intelligence officers from the Dresden area who were liable for war crimes.

Clemens had been every bit as much of a Masi as Felfe, with the difference that he declared himself more frankly. Essentially a less complicated kind of person, coarse and probably brutal, Clemens' human attachments were more real and meaningful than Felfe's. Where one has the impression that Felfe never made a move without a reason or recompense, one can imagine Clemens making a gratuitous or spontaneous gesture of loyalty or friendship. Felfe considered Clemens his cultural and intellectual inferior which is correct in a certain sense. But after his arrest, he pretended that the older man - Clemens is 16 years Felfe's senior - had exercised a dominating and permicious influence over him by drawing him into the Soviet service and making him stay there. Throughbut their MED careers, however, they remained good friends, and Clemens in his post-errest statement claimed that there had never been any friction or rivalry between them in their Soviet work.

c. Soviet Recruitment of Clemens and Felfe within a remarkably short time after Clemens' return to Germany about two months - Max sent Gerda Clemens to West Germany with a recruitment proposal for her husband. This occurred just at the end of 1949 or possibly in early January 1950. Clemens claims that the situation was perfectly clear to him: comply or face charges. Moreover, he had no steady job, he needed money, and he was also intrigued by the idea of a secret contact. He discussed the situation with both Felfe and Tiebel.

While none of the three seems to have opposed outright the idea of accepting the Soviet approach, they did entertain the notion of trying to offer Clemens to someone as a double-agent. Clemens even talked to an official in the Ministry of Interior. Unfortunately, the latter brushed him off without giving him any concrete advice. Felfe may have offered Clemens to the LfV; British files show that he told his British case officer in early 1950 that he intended to do so. Felfe had already tried unsuccessfully in November 1949, upon Clemens' strivel, to sell him to the British as an agent. (He also tried to persuade them to recruit Tiebel.) This effort had merely carned him the admonition to stay away from his old SS friends, who were bed medicine for someone supposed to penetrate the Communist Party. In January 1950 Felfe tried again, this time offering Clemens as a British-Soviet double agent. A letter dated 25 January 1950 from Tiebel to Felfe states that Clemens had already agreed in principle to cooperate with the Soviets in Dresden. The British files contain a memo of a visit by Felfe to his case officer on 29 January 1959, during which he reported that Gerda Clemens had arrived two days earlier and was planning to return shortly to Dresden with her husband in order to put him in touch with the KGB. The British lingered only briefly over the decision of whether to play Clemens as a double agent. Shortly after Felfe's proposal, evidence of his double-dealing with the LTV became evident, and he confessed to having sent a report on that organization to an East German Communist Party contact in East Berlin. When Frau Clamens appeared in Germany again in early April, and Felfe tried once more to persuade his employers to undertake an operation, the British case officers came to the decision that they should drop Felfe and list Clemens as a "security risk". By this time, of course, Clemens was no longer just a security risk; he had already gone to Dresden and become a Soviet agent.

In February 1950 Clemens went to Dresden, where he was led by his wife to meet Colonel Max in the Soviet "Waldschloesschen" Compound.
Here, Max debriefed Clemens on his life history and present contacts, lectured him on his culpability as an SD criminal, probed his feelings of confusion and resentment, listened constructively while Clemens delivered himself of a long pent-up statement of his hatred for the Americans.
(They had been twice the cause of German defeat, etc., had smashed his home town and caused the death of at least five of his relatives.) Max at this point took Clemens on a tour of bombed-out Dresden and, at the tide of Clemens' emotional reaction, offered him an opportunity of revenge against the Americans. The proposal was clear cut and precise:

as a Soviet agent Clemens was to return to the Western zones, seek out old police and SD contacts and through them try to penetrate the Gehlen Organization. The Gehlen Organization was an "Amiladen" (an American shop), and any blow aimed at it was a blow at the Americans. Clemens agreed: for money, for a personal cause, and to be on the side of power, but not, he insisted, because of any special sympathy toward the Russians. (Here, as in many other cases, are strains of the old Nazi theme of German superiority to Russians.) He signed himself on as a Soviet agent with the cover name "Peter:" later he used German girls' names. At this first meeting Clemens provided Max with a list of potential recruits in which he included the names of both Felfe and Tiebel. Clemens says he was very impressed by Max and by his psychological adroitness: Max was civil, sober, authoritative. knowledgeable, but most important - as both Clemens and Felfe have stressed many times - he never pushed or threatened directly. His watchwords were to proceed slowly and naturally.

When Clemens returned to West Germany he told Tiebel and Felfe the whole story and was able without much difficulty to recruit them, in turn, for Max. (Clemens states it was perfectly clear to his friends that Max's target was the Gehlen Organization. Felfe claims that he did not understand that this was the case until much later.) When Tiebel paid his first visit to Dresden some months later, he received much the same treatment as had Clemens, with perhaps greater emphasis on the threat of war crimes indictment. He received the cover name "Erich," which he kept throughout his agent career. Felfe, who by this time was working as a refugee interrogator in the Ministry for All-German Affairs, resisted making the trip east for another year. He did, however, submit reports to Clemens. Tiebel was later to be used as a courier.

Clemens was able to carry out his assignment for Max with amazing rapidity. In March 1950 he came across an old acquaintance from the Dresden police named Wilhelm Krichbaum who was then employed in a sub-unit of GV"L" in Bavaria. Through him Clemens was able to join the Gehlen Organization in June of 1950 as a registry clerk and courier for the same unit. (Clemens' Gehlen Organization alias was "Cramer.") Krichbaum himself was later to become highly suspect as an early MGB/Oresden penetration of the Gehlen Organization, but it is not known whether or not he wittingly maneuvered Clemens or Felfe in the organization for the Soviets. Clemens remained in Krichbaum's unit for two years, during which time he reported on the organization and personnel of both the Bavarian unit and its parent base, GV"L", and on anything else that came his way. His reports were typed on thin paper and hidden in cans of powdered milk which he sent periodically to his wife in Dresden. He collected reports from Felfe whenever they had the opportunity to meet and sent them on in the same way. (Since Felfe is reported, in British files, as having made a trip to Southern Germany within a few days of trying to sell the plans for the BfV charter to a news service, it is a good guess that these documents might also have found their way into one of Clemens' milk cans.) There was relatively little communication from Max; what there was was handled by Gerda Clemens, who served as courier and mail drop.

When Felfe's work for the Ministry for All-German Affairs drew to a close in September 1951, he agreed to make his first visit to Max in Dresden. At about the same time Clemens recommended him to Krichbaum as a reliable and experienced intelligence officer and Krichbaum arranged for his employment by the Gehlen Organization. Although Felfe will not admit it, it seems likely that there was a definite cause and effect relationship between the timing of his availability for work in the Gehlen Organization and his trip to Dresden. Max was primarily interested in the Gehlen Organization as a target, and presumably it was at the point when Felfe was actually able to penetrate his target that Felfe became of importance. There is some suggestion in our records - no evidence - that Felfe might really have been recruited earlier, but even if this is so his serious Soviet work probably did not begin until he was approperly accredited West German intelligence officer.

Felfe admite that he wrote a declaration of willingness "to work for peace", but claims he did not sign a pladge to work for Seveet probligence as such. He received the cover none "Paul", He tells us yary little about this first visit; he says he was well wined and dined in the Karlshorst satahouse where he spent the night and that Max made a great affort to establish a friendly, sociable atmosphere. He says war gave him no instructions at this meeting, whether this is true or not, subsequent events played themselves out exactly to Max's wishes.

On the 26th of October Felfe was called to Karlsrube for a personal ... interview with the chief of GV"L". He made a good impression, was hired as an assistant to the GV"L" chief for Soviet CE operations, Oscar Reile, and requested to begin work on 15 November. (Felfe's Gehlen Organization alies was Friesen.") Felfe and Clemens celebrated the event that night with a good dinser. Sometime shortly after this and before he actually began work, Felfe paid his second visit to Max. This time Max went more deeply late questions of metivation and access. He took Felfe on the tour of Deweden too 21 squeed at some length the need for Soviet-West German understanding. He stressed the theme of criminality of SS membership and the fact that Felfe would need Soviet protection to keep his her job and to keep his record hidden. Having see agent into the remission, Max was now concerned to meneuver him to the most desirable spot. Significantly, he asked felfs to try to get himself posted to the Schlam Headquarters. Again, he stressed the meed Felfe would have for Sovietprotestion, warning him that even if his 88 men pership were not discovered he would always run the risk of losing his job in the intelligence service because of some flap which might not even be his fault. These words were acceptat more than prophetic, for even then vers browing in various parts of the Geblen Organization, and particularly in GV"L" and its sub-waits, the first in a series of scandalous "defections", "1: "syrings" and security "incidents" which were engineered wholly or in part by the Soviets as part of a compains to descredit and disorient the organization. August 1953 - first as assistant to Reile and, later, after Reile's transfer to headquarters in July 1952, as the main Soviet CE referent. Reile became very impressed with the young man's energy and ability, and when he himself moved to the headquarters CE Group to work on Soviet targets he opened the door for Felfe's future career as a Soviet CE expert.

Here again, as in the case of Krichbaum, stands a question mark: there is much conjecture and considerable evidence that Reile, too, was working on the Soviet side.

d. Alternate Versions of Recruitment by KGB and Hiring By Gehlen Organization

ond Felfe's own statements concerning their recruitment by the KGB. But there is a great deal in their own admissions concerning their early post-war years which suggests that Felfe might have been recruited by the KGB in East Germany in the ADAO's rather than the 1950's. The detailed reasoning behind this speculation is paripheral to the main story and is not included here, but it is interesting to note that when the defector Michal Goleniewski read Felfe's testimony he immediately same to the same conclusion. Coleniewski is the samior Polish Intelligence (UB) officer who provided the lead which eventually led to Felfe's arrest. He said he thought Felfe had probably been recruited while working for the British and traveling to the East. Our best guess is that this would have been in 1948, when he was allegedly arrested by the East German Police and released after intercession by a benefactor in the Education Ministry.*
But Felfe could well have been recruited even earlier than this. Germiewski surmised that it was probably Felfe who spotted Clemens to the KGB, which then assigned the "recruitment" of Felfe mb to Clemens as a would never have been the wiser. Goleniewski thought the Soviets did not employ this technique of "concealed recruitment" (the writer's terminology) very often, but claimed to have seen it often enough to be completely familiar with the method.* Certainly Clemens' account of his recruitment of Felfe makes it appear that Felfe had been waiting for it with open arms.

There are also alternate explanations of the circumstances surrounding the Gehlen Organization's hiring of Clemens and Felfe, circumstances which were probably unknown to Clemens and perhaps also to Felfe. Wilhelm Krichbaum, who was responsible for both of them being hired by the Gehlen Organization, was himself a highly suspect individual. Although it cannot be proven, there is a distinct possibility that the hiring was manipulated by the KGB, this of the Labeure Fellowigu (Accept Multary Police) Krichbaum was a former Almaha and Sestage officer who served as a witness at the Nuremberg trials from from 1947 to 1948 and then entered the Gehlen Organization in early 1950. There is a report that he had some sort of contact with the KGB in Dresden as early as 1946. In April 1952 he was relieved of his job in the Gehlen Organization as a result of investigations which followed the arrest of KGB agents Ponger and Verber in Vienna. Ponger had been using Krichbaum as a source of information on the Gehlen

^{*}An example of "concealed recruitment" which occurs in the LEMA case is perhaps significant because the LEMA case was in so many respects a sort of overt shadow play of Felfe's secret KGB career. LEMA reported in early 1954 that he had spotted a close business colleague of his for the KGB. He said his KGB case officer told him he himself would recruit LEMA's colleague and then instruct him to recruit LEMA in turn as a subsource. LEMA should pretend to accept the approach without admitting that he already was a Soviet agent and responsible for the other man's recruitment in the first place. In this way the KGB would have an excellent double check on the new agent and LEMA himself would enjoy a slightly greater degree of security since he and the other man were very close professional colleagues. (Readers familiar with the LEMA case will recognize here an episode involving Dr. Scurla of the "Verlag der Mation.")

Organization and had also been trying through him to arrange for the Lytte B,VD hiring of yet another suspect KCE agent, After his arrest, Ponger said he had suspected Krichbuam of being a Soviet agent; Krichbaum, however, said he had not suspected Ponger. The result was the conclusion that Krichbaum had been an innocent incompetent who had been used unwittingly by Ponger.* But when KGB officer Anatoliy Golitsyn defected in December 1961, he provided a description of a KGB agent whose background paralleled that of Krichbaum. In the interim, Krichbaum had died, so the case was never resolved.

The role which Oscar Reile may have played in the hiring and subsequent promotion of Felfe is equally suspect, as Reile too was probable. allest contents a KGB agent. Reile was Felfe's first boss in the Gehlen Organization, and it was Reile who arranged for Felfe's transfer from GV"L" to the Headquarters CE Group. In 1956. Reile traveled to the United States with a group of CE experts, which included Felfe and four other BND officers. When Goleniewski reported that the KGB had two agents in this group. Reile and Felfe were considered to be the most likely candidates. There is also other information from Goleniewski and from Golitsyn which tends to point to Reile, but this is another lengthy story. Reile was investigated by the BND both before and after Felfe's arrest, but no information could be found which qualified as legal evidence of treason. (Under German law a suspect must be caught almost in flagrante.) However, the BND and CIA officers concerned with Reile's case are personally persuaded by the circumstantial evidence available that Reile is a long-standing KGB agent. Because of this suspicion, Reile was retired from the BND in August 1963.

e. Early Stages of KGB Operation -- the BALTHASAR Deception

The late fall meetings of 1951 in Karlshorst and Dresden were Max's last appearance. At this time Felfe was introduced to Max's assistant, "Alfred," and to another Soviet whom Felfe and Clemens nicknamed "Big Alfred," for want of any other name. In 1952 Alfred It is notiworthy that took over the handling of Felfe, Clemens and Tiebel, and Alfred continued as their case officer. To judge from the composite reports of his three agents. Alfred was an action shingly young man when he first took over the job water afficer - about 26. He spoke excellent German, also English, and had a thorough knowledge of his subject matter: the wartime and postwar German intelligence services. He seems to have impressed the older men by his general civility as well as his intelligence. Where they possibly expected to find the Russian bear, they found instead politeness and a greater degree of refinement than they had thought possible. They have all remarked repeatedly that Max and Alfred treated them in the right way psychologically, and that this treatment went a long way in influencing them to serve the Soviet State Security Service.

The first problem which Alfred had to tackle as case officer for Felfe and Clemens was to perfect the very shaky and dangerous communications system with his agents. At the moment, it depended on Gerda Clemens, an East Zone resident. Clemens had not reported to the Gehlen Organization that he was still in contact with his wife. On the contrary, he went out of his way to give the impression that he loathed her and had nothing to do with her. Most people had the impression that he was divorced. Actually he was not; the Soviets would not allow him, or help him, to get a divorce, since it provided them with a control in that his two children still lived with their mother. This constituted a shaky point in the security of the operation, because if his secret communications with his wife had become known, this could have caused suspicion of Clemens on the part of the BND. Unfortunately, however, it is just one of several potentially suspicious items about Falfe and Clemens which did not come to official notice until too late. While Tiebel had been recruited as a courier, he could be used only occasionally, since as a lawyer in a small town he had only very rare excuses to go to Berlin. (He had relatives in East Germany whom he managed to meet occasionally in West Berlin, and Clemens twice managed to hire him for the Gehlen Organization for brief periods as a source on various general East German targets, using the East Zone relatives as sub-sources.) Gehlen employees were in an even more difficult position: no Gehlen employee could travel to Berlin without special permission - in effect, without an official reason. The simplest answer, then, was to provide the agents with a good official reason for coming to Berlin on a fairly regular basis.

What was needed was a case which would specifically require the presence of Clemens in Berlin from time to time as the Gehlen handler.

Such a case was the BALTHASAR case (BND cryptonym), an operation engineered entirely by the Soviets for the Mulpose of providing mobility to their agent. BALTHASAR was Fritz Baltrusch, a Russian speaking Balt who at one time had been Clemens' superior in the Dresden SD. As of mid-1952 he was a doorman-receptionist at a Soviet run uranium plant in Dresden and an agent for the KGB. At KGB instruction he wrote to Clemens, implying he had something of interest to discuss, and asking for a meeting in West Berlin. Alfred did not brief Clemens in advance that this would happen, nor did he tell BALTHASAR that Clemens was also a Soviet agent. Clemens rose satisfactorily to the occasion and on his own initiative seized this chance to work up a case which would provide him with opportunities to meet Alfred. In doing so he also showed his good faith to the Soviets. Clemens took a proposal to GV"L" headquarters (very likely to Oscar Reile) that he be allowed to go to Berlin to find out what BALTHASAR wanted and to see what he might have to offer for the Gehlen Organization.* The convenient result was that Clemens was ordered officially to Berlin to see BALTHASAR. BALTHASAR of course appeared to have excellent possibilities as a source on the uranium processing plant. At a second meeting a short time later, Clemens was able to recruit him for the Gehlen Organization. From something in BALTHASAR's manner, however, Clemens suspected a Soviet presence. He told Alfred about the case for the first time after recruiting BALTHASAR and learned that Alfred had indeed engineered the contact especially for Clemens. Alfred admonished Clemens never to let BALTHASAR guess that he, Clemens, was a Soviet agent. BALTHASAR only knew that Clemens worked for Gehlen. In addition, Clemens was to be very careful in his correspondence with BALTHASAR as the Gehlen case officer; he must always let BALTHASAR take the initiative in setting meetings times, so that no one at the uranium plant would have cause to suspect BALTHASAR's intelligence connections. By the same token Alfred claimed that any information produced by BALTHASAR for the Gehlen Organization would be good, and BALTHASAR would reply to any EEI to which he had logical access. (Clemens was very impressed when BALTHASAR was allowed to deliver to the Ghelen Organization in fulfillment of a requirement a piece of uranium in the state in which uranium was regularly shipped to the USSR for final processing.)* Alfred said that Clemens would not need to report to Alfred about his contacts with EALTHASAR; Alfred would get this information from BALTHASAR himself. Thus Clemens would no longer

- 30 -

- 31 -

^{*}It Is no coincidence that of all possible varieties of operation which the KGB could have chosen as a vehicle to provide cover for Clemens' trips to Berlin, they picked one which produced information on a target which at the time was of number one importance to the West for positive intelligence collection, and to the East for security protection. At the time, BALTHASAR's information on uranium ore shipments was considered one of the few important successes of the Gehlen Organization. U. S. estimates of Soviet nuclear capability drew upon this type information. In addition to providing cover for Clemens' trips, BALTHASAR was obviously an ideal deception channel, but we do not know for certain whether the Soviets doctored the uranium sample and the ore shipment information for this purpose. There were other sources reporting on this field at that time. It is possible the Soviets were aware the information was already compromised and thus permitted BALTHASAR to pass good information. It is equally possible the other sources were also under KGB control and part of a multi-channel deception. Both explanations are consistent with known KGB modus operandi.

need to communicate directly with his wife, as Alfred would learn of Clemens' plans to come to Berlin through BALTHASAR and would automatically expect to see Clemens immediately after the meeting with BALTHASAR.

For the next two and a half years this case was used as a cover for Clemens's trips from West Germany to Berlin to meet his Soviet case officer. He delivered both his own and Felfe's reports on these trips and brought back instructions and money (often concealed in the lid of a candy-box). Clemens met Alfred about every two months in a Karlshorst safehouse, where their discussions were regularly recorded on tape. For the most part their reports were delivered in clear text or orally by Clemens. Not until later were more elaborate and technical methods of communication introduced. The BALTHASAR case provided the main method of communication until the fall of 1955, when it collapsed because of one of those unhappy flaps of which Max had spoken so prophetically to Felfe. (Copies of BALTHASAR's reports to Clemens were found in the home of a Gehlen employee who had been accused of working for the East, and the case therefore was declared "blown to the opposition.") While the insecure link via Gerda Clemens had been eliminated, the BALTHASAR channel was slow and unwieldy. There were two accommodation addresses to bolster it and there was Tiebel with his automobile for emergency use, but neither of these methods was safe or satisfactory for regular communication.

During 1952 and 1953 Felfe and Clemens reported extensively on GV⁴L⁵ and on those of its field sub-bases which they knew. For a time they worked together in organizing a sub-base for the Rhineland in Duesseldorf, but for the most part their assignments kept them physically separated - Felfe in Karlsruhe and later at headquarters (Munich/Pullach), and Clemens in Stuttgart and later Cologne. The difficulties in local communication between Clemens and Felfe remained throughout their careers a weak part of the Soviet operation, since Gehlen regulations officially discouraged social contact between fellow-workers. Thus, their frequent correspondence, long-distance telephone calls and visits were quite abnormal. For a while, in the fall of 1952, Felfe had a case (Dolezalek) which allowed him trips to Berlin, but this folded for some vaguely defined security reason. In December 1952 Alfred provided Felfe with a cover address and a carbon S/W system, and also with a KGE office telephone number in Karlshorst for emergency use, thus giving him some measure of independence from Clemens. Nevertheless, Alfred's cardinal operating tenet was that his agents must do nothing outside of their ordinary working schedule; at all costs, contact with the Soviets must occur within the framework of officially sanctioned Gehlen business.

In August 1953 Felfe was able to transfer to the headquarters CE group with the help of Oscar Reile. He was now definitely the more promising of Alfred's agents.

III. Operations of the Early 1950's

During the period 1952 to 1955, the major theme on which Soviet CE operational planning in Germany revolved was the question of the Gehlen Organization's legalization as the official West German Intelligence Service, and - equally important - of Reinhard Gehlen's personal tenure as chief of that organization. 1952 marks the beginning of talk about an eventual restoration of West German sovereignty. Despite recurrent threats to Gehlen's tenure and powers, the KGB had apparently decided by the middle of the year that the Gehlen Organization was probably there to stay. As the creature of the strongest occupation power, it probably would one day become the official German service. From the Soviet point of view, it was no longer simply a vehicle with which to harrass and penetrate U.S. operations, but another place to seek a toehold in the future West German government. 1952 also saw the beginning of a serious, aggressive build-up in Soviet work against the Mest German target. In the early part of the year an extensive recruitment campaign was mounted in the USSR (among POWs) and in East Germany for agents who could be resettled in West Germany. In the latter part of the year a general reorganization of the Soviet State Security Service brought to East Germany a new, tougher, more tightly organized group of counterespionage officers.* This was a period too of intense in-fighting among the nascent West German security and intelligence services - the BfV, the BND, and the Defense Ministry. the future Willhary Security Service (MA). These organizations rivaled each other for the supremacy of their service and many persons vied with Gehlen, both from within and without the Gehlen Organization, for his job.

a. Efforts to Discredit the Gehlen Granization

The NGB goals during the early 1950's were alternately, to weaken and discredit the Gehlen Organization by exposing it as riddled with Soviet agents, and to manipulate it through well-place penetrations. General Gribanov, Chief of the KUB Internal Counterintelligence Directorate. is quoted reliably as having made the statement that between 1953 and 1955 the Soviet services deliberately exposed over 100 of their double agents and staff penetration agents in an effort to force changes in the Gehlen Organization leadership. The Soviets, he said, had two agents at that time in the organization's leadership. One of them was foreseen as "chief of the organization". But in the context of the statement it is not totally clear just what washesut by "the organization." Our source who heard the statement claims it referred to a KGB plan to replace Gen. Gehlen himself with a Soviet agent.* Thus is certainly a logical KGB objective, and the KGB may have felt at that time that it had the assets to achieve such a goal. However, there is also a tamable argument that the actual KIB objective for its agent was the job as chief of one of the major components of the organization, such as GV"L", rather than chief of the organization as a whole.

the long range penetrations designed to produce high priority information and to affect policy, and the shorter range penetrations designed to be blown in order to confuse, discredit and deceive. False became a long range operation, but for one Felse there were any number of three-eway penetrations during this period of Soviet operational history. The throw-aways were just as necessary for Soviet purposes as the long range operations, but from time to time the one threatened the longevity of the other Enile Alfred was carefully devising a new and complicated modus operandifor Felfe, destructive scandals were already taking shape in various of Gehlam's field bases. At least one of them was seriously to endanger Felfe. In February of 1953 a section chief in Berlin, Wolfgang Hoeher, was apparently kidnapped and spirited into East Berlin. It later became apparent that this was a case of a long-time agent being recalled and that the kidnapping scene had been contrived both for cover and dramatic effect. (Felfe was detailed to investigate Hoeher's disappearance since he and Hoeher had been friends. He reported on the investigation to Alfred, and to his superiors in the Gehlen Organization he maintained consistently that Hoeher had been truly kidnapped and was not a Soviet agent as of the time of his disappearance. Hosher was subsequently turned over to the East German Intelligence Service, for whom he ran operations against Ochlan for several years.) In October of the same year another pensaration of the Gehlen field base in Berlin, Hens Geier, was recalled to Bast Germany when he feared compromise to West Serman authorities. Corists in Rest Builty. In November 1953 a third disappearance or defection took place - again a Berlin based officer - Werner Basse. The East German radio armounced a massive roll-up of Gehlen agents in the East Zone following Geier's recall in October, and in December the East German press launched an expose of the Gehlen Organization. The main substance of the East German material appeared to be on Gehlen's field bases, rather than the headquarters, with a strong emphasis on GV"L" and its dependencies. Felfe recognized some of his own reporting and was somewhat unessy. Analysts in the Gehlen Organization also found considerable portions of it attributable to Hocher and Geier. The most immediate effect of all of this was to produce a reorganization of the GV"L" base. It was redesignated, reorganized and moved to another location. Cautious analysts assumed, however, that so destructive an expose would not be deliberately undertaken unless some penetration asset remained safely behind to report on the organization.

Some of the scendals which shook the Gehlen Organization during this Beriod were demonstrably KIB-organized but others were quite naturally self-generated. The situation was over-ripe for scandal in the atmosphere of intense recrimination, suspicion, and character assassination which accompanied the West German political rivalries at this time. Some of the Gehlen Organization's security operations contributed heavily to this atmowithere. Most of these operations were run by Indvig Albert, the CI Chief and later Deputy Chief of GV"L". Albert's CI branch was investigating the security of other West German agencies and, in the early 1950's, one of its most immediate objectives was to search out rightest elements in the government. For this purpose, Albert ran a musber of "special connections" in mearly every Land and federal security agency. From time to time these special connections became known, with obviously scandalous results. While Gehlen was homestly worrying on the one hand about Nazi remnants and Communist infiltrators, his security operations, on the other hand, tended to give the impression of a widespread infiltration of police power, sometimes of ex-Mari police power, throughout the West German government.

Indeed, some of the investigators looked as fearsome as the things they said they were investigating. There was alarm on many fronts, not the least among American occupation agencies.

In fear of its unwieldy offspring, U.S. Army European Command asked CIC in 1949 to mount a similar security penetration of the West German government in order to test for rightist influences. The CIC effort, known as "Operation CAMPUS", lasted until 1953, by which time it had become politically embarrassing and had to be closed down. ACAMPUS utilized two German pricipal agents, Heinrich Schmitz and Richard Schweizer, who in turn had their own "special connections" throughout the various federal and Land security agencies. The relationship between Schmitz and Albert was rather complex. In addition to sharing many of the same informants, Albert had hired Schmitz in early 1952 to report on CEC to the Gehlen Organization. Gehlen later ordered Albert to drop Schmitz because his reports on CEC were not of value, but Albert did not do so, ostensibly because of his close friendship with Schmitz. When the CAMPUS operation was terminsted by CIC and Schmitz feared losing his job, Albert agreed to reverse the flow of information. He began giving Schmitz reports on the Gehlen Organization for passage to CIC. Albert's reports to CIC concerned derogatory information on Gehlen Organization personnel, with particular emphasis on Felfe, whom Albert labelleds as a suspected Soviet agent.

The situation was vastly complicated, and in retrospect it in even more complicated than it appeared at the time, for we now know several very important additional facts. One of these is that Albert reported his "recruitment" by CIC To Gen. Gehlen, and that he was in effect run by Gehlen as a double agent against CIC. Another is that he was also and attitude of the while -- an agent who, in the end, became expendable and was present deliberately fingered and demounced by the first itself. In the next several pages we try to shed some light on this complex situation and Felfer's role therein, but the reader should note that what follows is a speculative and interpretive account. There are important gaps in this aspect of our knowledge of the Felfe case, and it is possible to interpret the known facts in other ways.

The story as we see it begins with the defection of KDB officer

Petr Dervabin in Vienna in February 1954. Dervabin had served in the Gehlen Organization. Deryabin was able to report to his CIA debriefers the cryptonyms of three KIB agents in the Gehlen Organization, two of Which were identified many mears later as the KIB cryptonyms for Felfe and Clemens; the third remains unidentified, but may possibly have been either Geisr or Haase, both of whom had gone to East Berlin and been surfaced there prior to Deryabin's defection. The KiB was probably uncertain of the full extent of Derysbin's knowledge of agent identities. In any case, the KGB had ample cause for concern about the security of its agents within the Gehlen Organization. Knowing that Deryabin's revelations would prompt another investigation of Gehlen Organization security, it became important to the KGB to divert the investigation in a way designed to protect the most important MB agents.* The KUB operation which appears to have been run for this purpose is known by its Gehlen Organization eryptonym, LILLI MARIEW.

In June 1954, just four months after Deryahin's defection, a German citizen reported to the local police in Ludwigsburg, West Germany, that he had seen a man place something under a certain lamppost. The man's furtive menner had aroused the citizen's suspicions. On inspecting the spot, the police found a deaddrop containing a role of microfilm. Several days later, having placed surveillance on the area, they caught a man trying to retrieve the deaddrop. This man quickly comfessed to being a KGB agent.

The microfilm turned out to be a very complete report on GV"L" -- its organisation, personnel, and many of its operations. It was signed "Artur"/, and clearly implied that "Arthr" was actually in GV"L". Gehlen analysts felt (% that only the chief of GV"L? or his deputy could have such a comprehensive knowledge, yet the style in which it was written and certain incorrect nomenclature suggested that the report might have been prepared by an outsider. All things considered, the primary suspect was the chief of GV"L", Bensigner, as he had already been under investigation for marious reasons for a long time. Albertwes a second suspect.

agent whose first name was Artur -- the same name as was signed to the report in the deaddrop -- was approached by a Soviet agent who tried to persuade him to come to the East. When Artur refused, the agent tried to provoke Artur to call the local police and have him, the Soviet agent, arrested. Artur refused to rise to either provocation. This incident may have been designed to lead to Albert, who was Artur's GV"L" case officer, or it may have been meant to provide a handle to force the public surfacing of the LILLI MARLEM find for propaganda purposes.

emong those assigned to investigate the LHLI MARIES case.* No thanks to yelfe, an important break in the case did come several months later. A mail intercept on the man the had reported the deaddrop to the Indrigaturg police revealed that he was in contact with the Same KHB principal agent in East Berlin who had dispatched the agent the police had arrested trying to recover the deaddrop. Subsequent investigation confirmed what had previously been vaguely suspected -- namely, that the discovery of the deaddrop was a deliberate Soviet expose. The document had been prepared by the KHB hence the errors in nomenclature. One was agent had been sent to Indvigature to emplace the report in the deaddrop, a second KHB agent had been instructed to tell the Indvigature police that he had accidentally discovered it, and a third agent had been sent to walk unwittingly into the police stake-out and be arrested while attempting to empty the deaddrop.

This exposure of the LILLI MARIER deedrop as a Soviet deception operation only served to add to the mystery, rather than to clarifying it.

The KIB clearly had an excellent source of information on GV"L", and the problem of identifying this source remained. Moreover, several additional questions rose: Why would the KIB went the Gehlen Organization to know GV"L" was penetrated? Would the KIB cause so much attention to be focused on GV"L" if it really did have good agents there? Might the KIB have had the intention (foiled for the moment) of trying to burn an old recalcitrant agent who was causing trouble? Or, might LILLI MARIER have been attempt to deflect attention from a walneble agent who had moved explanation relates to Deryabin's defection and KHB efforts to minimize assumed to have been the damage caused by his revelations. The KNB had nothing to lose by indicating it still had an active penetration of the Gehlen Organization --Deryabin had already done that. But it did have a wital interest in creating a certain impression as to who or where that penetration was. By calling attention to GV"L" as the locus of Soviet penetration, both Felfe and probable KGB agent Reile were protected, as both had by this time already transferred from GV"L" to Headquarters. KDB agent Albert, on the other hand, was caught in the middle, and we do not know what the Soviets intended should happen to him. As it worked out, Albert was promoted from Chief CI to Deputy Chief of GV"L" during the reorganization which followed the LILLI MARIEN investigation, so it could be that the Soviets intended that he benefit from the operation. It is more likely, however, that he had become expendable and was the intended target of the LILLI MARLEN exposure, a scapegoat to make it appear that the most whose existence was important of the agents known to Deryabin had been caught. If so, that part of the Soviet plan which was intended to finger Albert as the source of the LILI MARIEN deaddrop either did not work (the provocation of Artur) or was aborted after the Gehlen Organization tumbled to the fact that

The MGB probably had cause for being discontent with Albert and wanting him out of the way. Since at least 1953, Albert had been voicing dissatisfaction with certain of Gehlen's personnel policies. Part of this dissatisfaction was undoubtedly justified; part surely steamed from an old rivalry between GV"L" and the Headquarters CE chief, Dr. Kohler, and when GV"L" officers like Reile and Felfe "defected" from GV "L" and went to work on Dr. Kohler's staff, they too became personal targets of Albert. But even apart from the influence of the rivalry with Dr. Kohler, there had been numerous instances when Felfe's behavior, operational and personal, had incurred Albert's particular wrath and even suspicion. Albert's main objections were to the closeness of Felfe, Reile, and certain of their friends in what he termed an "SD clique." He considered them "politically umreliable" and possibly dangerous. With few exceptions, Albert's NO FOREIGN complaints fell on deaf ears within the Gehlen Organization, but Big - 38-Brother must also hApproved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328t to imagine that emplacement of the deaddrop was a deliberately staged KGB scenario.

Albert's accusations against Felfe could have been made on KUB instructions or with KiB approval. It is more plausible that the KiB was considerably irked at the thought of ens-1888 agent, denouncing emption KOB agent, that Albert's actions cast doubt upon his loyalty to the cause, and that the RIB's hands were tied because telling Albert to lay off Felfe would mean in effect confirming to him that Felfe was indeed a Soviet agent. Professional jealousy may have played a role. What motivated HUB agent Albert to denounce Felfe is not clear. Ferhaps, too, he felt the signs of penetration of the Gehlem Organization's CE operations were so clear, that it was necessary to develop a scapegoat; by focusing attention on Felfe, Albert may have hoped to divert suspicion from himself. The latter theory is supported by the fact that Albert intensified his accusations against Felfe after dimiting of the LILLI MARIEN deeddrop, and incident which probably caused Albert many a sleepless night. In September 1954, Albert began passing information to CIC via Schmitz, and over a period of about six months he spelled out in very precise terms his suspicions that Felfe, among others, was an "enemy." He told CIC that he considered Felfe responsible for the betrayal of one of his sources who was nessed in the December 1953 press exposé on the Gehlen Organization; he thought Felfe's behavior in investigating some of the recent flaps was "suspect;" he described in detail several incidents in which Felfe behaved with suspicious curiosity in matters of no concern to him; and he elaborated repeatedly on the extent to which the Headquarters CE Group seemed to be am SD

At this point in the Albert story, we come to a major gap in our knowledge. As noted previously, Albert reported his "recruitment" by CIC to Gen. Gehlen and was run by Gen. Gehlen as a double agent against CIG. Although Gehlen directed the case personally, there was one case officer involved who was never identified to CIA but who may have been relife. This phase of the Albert affair was neticulously kept secret from CIA by both Gen. Gehlen and by CIC. Gen. Gehlen has persisted in believing that CIA was the actual controlling service behind the CIC recruitment of Albert, and the Gehlen Organization files have been denied to us. CIC records on the case were also never revealed to us, estensibly because of the hopeless task of attempting to retrieve the files. Therefore, we do not know when the "doubling" of Albert took place. We do not know whether Gen. Gehlen specifically approved Albert's passage of derogatory information on Felie to CIC, nor, if so, why. We suspect, but do not know for certain, that Felfe was somehow involved in the case. We do not know whether Albert reported truthfully on this espect of his activity to the MES, or whether he withheld this information. In view of these gaps in our knowledge, we are not certain that the KGB knew of Albert's denunciation of Palfe to CIC, but it is present reasonable to assume it did, since charly there were a number of ways in which it could have obtained this information. If the KGB was aware of Albert's allegations against Felfe, it could scar cely have been happy about the situation. Indeed, it would have had considerably more urgent reasons for trying to get rid of Albert than was the case at the time of the LILLI MARLEN operation.

The finger was put on Albert in May 1955, nine months after he began reporting to CIC. Herbert Weimmann, a former East German MfS case officer/courier, after having been orwested in West Germany on a charge unrelated to espionage, made a clean breast of his espionage past in return for immunity from prosecution. In so doing he reported who had probably been recruited first by the KoB, and he Albert as an MTS and also compromised a large number of other dest relatively insignificant, MTS agents. According to Weissann, the first part of Albert's MfS dossier, which he claimed to have seen, had been translated into German from Russian. He could not say when Albert had been recruited by the KGB, or when he had been turned over by the MIB to the MfS, except that the file went back a number of years. Albert was arrested on the basis of Weinmannn's allegations, and during a search of Albert's house certain damaging evidence was uncovered, evidence never made available to CIA . According to Dernhardt, a senior security officer of the Gehlen Organization and a reliable source, part of the evidence was three sets of files of three Albert employers -- CIC, the Gehlen Organization and the MCS/NUB. Bernhardt stated privately that he had no doubt Albert was call agent, a clear indication that the totality of the evidence on this score was convincing to the Gehlen Organization.

But despite the evidence, Albert refused to admit to Eastern contacts until the night of 13 July, when his interrogators thought they saw signs he was ready to talk. Although his jailers were warned to watch him carefully, toward morning their attention wandered, and Albert was found handed — an action as baffling still for many people as on the day it happened.

There is no doubt that Weimmann was an MTE agent of long standing, but it is strongly suspected that his "confession" and demmeiation of Albert was KIE inspired. Although part of his information was clearly valida, othersparts were obtiously fabricated. After his release from jail in Hovember 1955, he was the object of some East German attention which looked very much like an attempt to support his bone fides as a source of information. A very well blown double agent allowed the Gehlan Organistion to come into possession of a latter addressed to Weimmann by his MTS case officer. In it the MTS officer expressed surprise that Weimmann had been released from prison so soon and concluded that he must have conducted himself well. A few months later Weimmann was contacted again, but this time through a more securely managed contact which may not have been intended to come to Western attention. At this time, Weimmann received instructions to "continue" giving information in the way he had been giving it, with a few specified exceptions.

been the subject of considerable analysis and speculation over the years.

There are many questions which remain unclarified, but one thing is clear.

The net effect of the Albert case was to solidify, rather than weaken, Felfe's position. It brought the magging derogatory data on Felfe out into the open, and shashow the doubts were resolved in Felfe's favor.

That he was cleared is evidenced by the special trust placed in him by

Gen. Gehlen, who from that time forward pushed in his direction the special "sensitive" cases in which Gehlen had a personal interest. To be sure, in belated consequence of Albert's accusations, Felfe was subjected to a security review on charges of "SD and Eastern commettions," but this was a perfunctory matter. In February 1956, Felfe was asked formally, "officer to officer, whether he had been a member of the SD. He replaced with a brazen "No, sir," despite the fact that his ID past was known to a number of Gehlen officers and could have been readily proven by a check of wartime redords under allied control at the Berlin Documents Center.* The results of this "investigation" were "inconclusive". Although the NED's security file on Felfe was kept up in a desultory fashion for the rest of his careet, nothing much was to come from it alone. By this time, Felfe was already well on the way to becoming one of the more emergetic and productive CE experts in the NED. His professional reputation was growing, and Felfe's corner was a disheartening place in which to look for additional treachery.

b, Felfe Settles In the LEMA deception

While all these storms were breaking, Folfe was carefully settling in Operational to his new job asiz memior case officer in the Soviet Section of the CE Group. rersona/ He had his first/meeting with Alfred as a hemiquarters officer in the fall of 1954, almost a year after his transfer. He reveals only very generally what they discussed at this meeting: problems of access, his and Clemens'; and questions of how to hinder the legalization of the Gehlen Organization. He gives no further detail, but under these headings one assumes that the basic modus operandi and a certain number of specific cases must have been discussed. The basic operating plan was that Felfe should have one general meeting with his Soviet case officers each year. Communications from him would be via Clemens as courier and via S/W letters to an East Berlin accommodation address. Communication from Alfred would be via Clamens or directly to Felfe via microdot. (Felfe and Clemens disagree in their testimony as to who my microdot. Clemens' statements seem more plausible, namely, that it was Felfe who handled the migrodot communications, retrieving and developing the film and sending to Clemens only those EEI which

Felfe worked hard on several of his CIA lisison contacts to get him an "informal" copy of his Berlin Documentation Center dessier. He was clearly concerned that it might contain evidence to prove he had lied about his background. He may have hoped that he was lucky and that, as happened in many cases, his file had been lost or was incomplete. Another indication of his concern was a comment to a CIA lisison officer in March 1956. He said he had heard that Albert had taked Schmitz to investigate him, and that while he had receivApproved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328n, he hoped that Felfe in 1954 and, in addition, he was presented with a Minox. These technical innovations in the operation provided yet greater compartmentation between Felfe and Clemens and reflected the fact that Felfe was now seen as the senior of the two agents.

From the fall of 195k on, Felfe photographed Gehlen registry cards on a regular basis for Alfred; he also performed specific name checks for the NOB. Other file material he photographed on a more selective basis. As an example of his enormous sangfroid (or perhaps of the ease with which a spy can operate even in a highly compartmented agency), Felfe says that he used to photograph file material for Aldred in his office, with a triped, during the twenty minute interval between the official closing time of 5:00 p.m. and the beginning of overtime when special registration of one's presence in the building was required. He says he never photographed after this hour, even if he worked late officially, for fear of being controlled when leaving the building. When leaving the building he hid the film under his clothing next to his skin. Sometimes he handed the film directly to Clemens, sometimes he sent it to him by registered mail. On other occasions he checked files out officially and telk them with him when he had official business in Clemens' vicinity. Then he would photograph the material in Clemens' apartment, to which he had his own key. He was a keen smateur photographer (and in general & lower of gadgets) and later on built himself a darkroom in his weekend cottage where he could do some of his KUB work.

What Felfe does not tell us about this 1954 meeting with Alfred was, however, probably infinitely more important. Within a very short time after his arrival in headquarters, Felfe had been put in charge of a double agent through whom he was soon to make a reputation for himself as an authority on Soviet CE matters. This was called the "LEMA" case and was unquestionably the most important single contribution to Felfe's career as an intelligence officer. Felfe claims he never discussed this case with Alfred, that it was a "cleen" HED operation. This is generally accepted as being inconceivable, and Felfe's attempted deception only confirms the case's importance. The LEMA case gave Felfe maneuverability as a Soviet agent and status as a HED officer; it provided him with a channel to receive and to fulfill HEI; it broadened considerably his access both to collect information and sometimes to disseminate disinformation.

It fits the basic formula of the BALEHASAR case, only with a much grander conception and much greater complexity. For the years 1954 to 1958, it moves like the shadow play of Falfe's real Soviet career.

LEMA is the HMD cover name for Quenther Hofe, an East German political functionary and publisher. Hofe was a member of the Central Committee of the MDPD (National Democratic Party of Germany - an ostensibly independent political party), director of its publishing house, "Verlag der Mation," and editor of the perty feeting, Mationale Zeitung. He had a minor reputation as a political analyst, traveled frequently to West Germany and was well received in certain West German Socialist circles as an apparently independent, outspoken East Serman. IEMA's story to the BMD was that he had joined various Communist front groups in order to "bore from within," and that very soon after the war he decided for ideological reasons to volunteer his services to a Western intelligence service. Through an old Luftwaffe comrade in West Berlin he came into contact with French intelligence, the SDECE, in 1948. The French ran him for several years as a political source and were apparently highly satisfied with him. By early 1953 it had become apparent that the ex-Luftwaffe comrade was working as a principal agent for both the SDECE and the Gehlem Organization, and for a year or so IRMA wasi in effect run jointly. In mid-1954 the case was officially transferred to the Gehlen Organization. Somewhat prior to the turnover, the Geblen Organization asked CIA to evaluate some of IEBA's intelligence product for them. Without meming the source, they presented us with a copy of a study of the MDFD written by ERMA. CIA's branch for the study of international communism wrote an evaluation which said in part: "This study is a biased collection of overt and semi-overt knowledge of the MDPD, missing several essential points pertaining to the organization, purpose and utilization of the Party by the Soviets in Eastern Germany ... the extensive use of HDPD members by the Soviet intelligence for missions in West Germany is not mentioned." A prophetic note, but easier to read with hindsight.

by the Gehlen Organization as a political source. Within five months of Felfe's transfer to headquarters, however, LEMA abruptly became a CE case. Through the NDFD Party Chairman he had been introduced in January 1954 to a Soviet intelligence officer. After a flurry of meetings, he was formally recruited in early March and immediately assigned to the task of creating a net of agents to a select of the case of creating a net of agents to a select of the case of creating a net of agents to a select of the case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of creating a net of agents to a select of case of c

Poreign Office, the Chancellor's Office, and the Federal Press Office. The plan was grandiose: LEMA was to be the "German net director" to recruit two principal agents and a sort of general political advisor and spotter, and several support agents, and to provide names of potential peactration agents. As a double-agent in contact with the Soviets, whose activities were directly to affect West German security, the LEMA case now properly belonged to the CE Group of the Gehlen Organization. Felfe was made the headquarters case officer. He directed LENA through a field case officer whom he met regularly each time the field handler saw LEMA. Felfe personally met LEMA officially only two or three times. There is no evidence that the field handler or any other Gehlen personnel besides Felfe who were connected with the LEMA case were Soviet agents, although, since all analysis of this case insists that it was a KDB "set-up" from the beginning, at least one is strongly tempted to assume, the presence of a helping hand in the Gehlen headquarters to ensure that FEIfe would be made the responsible case officer. The highly suspect Rails was Felfe's immediate superior at this time; perhaps he helped steer the case, as perhaps this was done from a higher - echalony to the Lift operation received a great deal of attendion from the - Manual Transport of the service:

LEMA was cast as the perfect agent: intelligent, cool, a demonic worker ("meeds only four hours of sleep a night") with a phenomenal memory (he claimed to find it relaxing to memorize the license numbers and makes of the Soviet automobiles he saw in Karlshorst!). Felfe took great pains to point out LEMA's excellent personal qualities and to emphasize the indications in his reporting that the Soviet also had a very high respect for him. In contrast to LEMA, however, the Soviet handlers seemed somewhat naive. Indeed all his Soviet case officers in succession had the shocking fault of being chatterboxes and through them LEMA was ostensibly able to pick up a great variety of information about other Soviet agents end operations in West Germany which were unrelated to him. Furthermore, the NGB officers enjoyed talking politice, to such an intelligent men, and from these long conversations the BED was now and then given the "true" an apparent glimpse into Soviet policy in Germany. Much of the information that IEMA delivered to the Gehlen Organization was excellent. Several bone fide RU and MrS agents were identified for the BMD in this manner; The state of the s the KGB apparently had little compunction about throwing away the assets of its sister services, although it did give away some of its own assets too. KGB safehouses were all accurate; that is, there were traces from other cases on them. Unfortunately, it was not completely clear in 1954 and 1955 that these other cases were blown cases of the KUB/CE section working against the Gehlen Organization and the other German security services. Looking back on this fact, one can say that it should have been disconcerting to find so many traces from blown CE cases in a case which the MiB pretended was a political intelligence collection operation. Similarly disconcerting was the fact that one of LENA's case officers, Vladimir Shchukin, had been described to us in early 1954 by Daryabin as a former colleague working on West German security and intelligence agencies. Deryabin described him as incompetent, one fact at least which seemed to be corroborated by LENA. In addition to their talkativeness, Shehukin and his colleagues were unusual and puzzling in another respect: they dealt with their agent under their full, true names.* They were thus readily checkable. Technical discrepancies abounded too: for example the UNIX the NGB gave LEEA a false West German identity document in August 1954 which was so obvioually falsified that they said they were obliged to apologize, and that unfortunately they were unable to produce anything better.

On the surface IEEA's operation to penetrate Bonn on behalf of the seemed Soviets less spectabular than his speration to penetrate Karlshorst on behalf on the BED. The leads he gathered for the Soviets were numerous, but they often petered out. Namy potential recruits were reported to the Soviets (the Sehlen Organization standing by to make a double recruitment in case the Soviets followed up), but only one real penetration was actually recruited; an ailing and incompetent gentleman in the Press Office who contented himself with the product of waste baskets for his source material. To some observers it seemed incredible at the time that the KUB should go through so many motions just for this. And, indeed, it did not. The KUB was in fact very interested in information on the Foreign Ministry and Chancellor's office; personnel rosters, tables of organization, internal directories and other manorands, compressing information on leading officials, etc. These EET were all given directly to Felfe by Alfred. He admits that at his 1955 and 1956 meetings with the KUB officer they discussed these targets. In addition Alfred asked him to identify Gehlan informatis within the other government departments. Felfe denies that he was able to fulfill Alfred's requirements; he claims he told Alfred he had no access to such information. In a certain sense the told Alfred he had no access to such information. In a certain sense the

The singular and expecial importance of LEMA's net of agents in West Germany was that it forced the Gehlen Organization to produce "build-up" material on the target agencies on a systematic basis and to a greater extent than had ever been done before. It caused answers to be produced to Soviet questions, while at the same time creating the impression within the MMD that the Soviets did not have other agents in these targets.. Because of the comprehensive nature of LEMA's targets and because of his detailed reporting (described by CIA officers as "more than necessary"), LEMA gailetly became tagged as Gehlen's most important CE case. Felfe begged for permission to pass approprite build-up material to keep LENA's faltering net alive: the theory was that one had to please the Soviets so that a source of importance both for West German security and possibly for an eventual penetration of the KGB might remain viable. Felfe's principal problem was that at this time there was no provision for clearing build-up material in the German government. Felfe first tried to persuade marious security officials in Bonn, then he went to a CIA limison officer, hoping that we would intervene in some way. The than he went to the Pederal Attorney General and obtained a statement from him to the effect that any material already demonstrably known to the opposition was automatically no longer secret. By extension, that which was no longer secret could be passed to the opposition as build-up meterial. Finally, Ochlen himself briefed Adenauer and the State Secretary of the Federal Chancellary, Dr. Hans Globke, on the case and obtained Globke's agreement in the matter:

ministry personnel to the Soviets.* Thus armed, Felfe was able to maneuver a wide variety of information "legally" into Soviet hands. All that LENA's Soviet case officer had to do was to declare that certain areas of information were already known or already "covered" by them, and then Felfe could argue the virtue of providing that information to LENA as build-up or to satisfy presumed KUB cross-checking on LENA, or as a way of trying to smoke out the presumed Soviet source. Any number of Soviet targets could be traced in Bonn and in END files simply by working them into LENA's EET in some way. A there are many examples in LENA's reporting of persons or subjects of Soviet interest was flash into the limelight for a moment - perhaps long enough to be checked out in Western files? - and then disappear from the LENA case with the Soviet case officer's remark that he is no longer interested.

permission to conduct his own investigation of sonnel know to be under study by the Soviets, and on whom the Soviets were seeking information on vulnerabilities for recruitment attempts. Even more brash is the incident when Felfe asked a CIA limison officer if CIA could provide leads, from lists of dropped agents to persons who might be employed at a relatively high level in different Bonn ministries whom he could then recruit and "feed" to the KGB via LENA!

Through the LEMA operation, the EMD became intimately involved in the security of the West German Foreign Ministry, checking on targets of interest to the Soviets, passing build-up and deception material, etc. This established an important precedent at a time when the mascent West German intelligence and security organizations were still engaged in intensive in-fighting over the precise definition of their functions and ^{*} Here is a smote from remarks about Felfe's technique written, by the CIA liaison officer, for security matters; to the Ciales Constitution? Felfe "very eleverly played the Oberbundesanwalt (Federal Attorney General) against his own superiors. He obtained access to the Chancellor's office through Gehlen's own access. Then he used (the Chancellery's) approval of his wishes to insure the approval of Gehlen. Along the way he made references to the uncooperative attitude of various other officials, including the BfV and security officers in the Foreign Office. responsibilities. The BfV, which has formal responsibility for the security of government offices, was not yet sufficiently well-organized to exercise fully this responsibility. Using the IFMA case, the BMD moved into the vacuum and established a precedent which still holds. The BMD still exercises certain de facto responsibility for Foreign Office security, despite the BfV's formal authority in this field.

There was enother interesting gashoit in the LEMA operation which was used by Felfe to exacerbate the already existing friction between the HMD and the BfV. On Felfe's instructions, expressed concern to his Soviet case officer about operating in West Germany as a Soviet agent and about the danger that the BfV might get on his trail. The Soviet case officer allegedly advised LEMA to have no fear, as the BfV had only two files on him and they contained only routine information on LEMA's party activities. When Felfe got this information from LEMA he checked the BfV on an appropriate pretext and found that their files were exactly as described by the Soviet case officer. This was proof, Felfe them said, that the BfV was panetrated. This was cited rather widely by Gehlen, Felfe and other EMD officers to their American colleagues and presumably to other elements of the German government.

Felfs discovered during the course of the LEMA operation that CIA could be useful to him in various ways. In the LEMA case as in many subsequent ones, his contact with CIA was of enormous value as a kind of super-limison, since the various German services would sometimes tell their foreign confidentes more than they would tell each other. When LEMA's KUB officer wasted him to recruit a laborer working on the new Chancellery office building in 1955 so that a transmitter might be benied in it, Felfe came to CIA with the complaint that there were at least seven different German agencies to which a workman might report a recruitment approach and that his organization could be sure of hearing automatically from only two of them. He feared that it he did not have timely warning of such an approach he might lose the opportunity to double the worker securely: would we please munitor the situation for him? Typically for the LENA case, nothing came of this plan to recruit a workman and to plant an audio device. In retrospect, we speculate the Soviets were planning to approach such a worksan idependently of LEMA, and that they used this tactic to insure that Felfe would learn of it if their actual target reported the approach. Thus, if Felfe did not learn of any such approach, the KGB could be confident of the workman's bona fides and feel free to use its best (and most sensitive) type of audio equipment.

The LENA case, while dazzling for a while, produced many questions and suspicions in the minds of analysts in both the offen Organization and CIA. The unnatural talkativeness of the KGB case officers, the endless and inconclusive backing and filling in the setting up of his net, the Tack of Gehlen control (LENA came and went at his own initiative, and always in a hurry, to the West Berlin home of his old Luftwaffe friend, where he simply recorded what he wanted to say on tape and left); all these features were puzzling even while the case was new. One colleague of Felfe's, Dr. Herder, was puzzled enough to write a review of the case in late 1955. He decided it was a fraud, but he m was not yet quite certain why. Felfe's CIA contact felt the same way: there seemed to exist the possibility of a deception, but the obvious take for the Soviets did not appear to pay for output in terms of good leads given to the West. There was no internal logic to the case. This of course was the correct conclusion. There was no internal reason for running the case as a deception, but there was a very good "external" one: Felfe, whose benefits far outweighed the loss of any information to the West from the LENA operation. These stirrings of suspicion about the LENA case constituted the second obvious major danger signal - after Albert's denunctations - to Felfe. The LENA case would have to alter its course.

IV. KGB Work in West Germany as a Sovereign Country: 1956-61

The years 1955-1956 mark a major change in KGB operational policy in West Germany. The post-war period was over and West Germany had become a sovereign nation. By spring 1956 the Gehlen Organization had become the Federal Intelligence Service (Bundesnachrichtendienst - BND), a dependency of the Chancellor's Office, the legal foreign intelligence collection agency of the Federal Republic of Germany. Formal CIA trusteeship had ended. The BND was considerably reorganized and its relationship with CIA gradually began to normalize, although CIA has never really lost its "favored" position. To meet the new situation new units were created in the BND and BfV for the penetration of the Soviet installations, which were set up following the restoration of sovereignty and establishment of diplomatic relations with the USSR. CIA bases in Frankfurt and Bonn also turned their efforts on these targets and in doing so found the need, and the obligation, to operate closely - but as liaison equals - with the newly independent German agencies. In Berlin, CIA's operations base redoubled its efforts against the Soviet "extra-territorial" headquarters - Embassy, Trade Delegation, KG8 and GRU - in East Berlin, producing in the process a fairly comprehensive body of documentary and biographic material, which, along with the CIA German Station's library of CE case histories, became widely used for crosschecking new information as well as for trading purposes in the new Adms liaison relationships.

For the KGB, the BND was no longer a target for possible destruction: far more, now, it was an object to be manipulated. The opportunity to replace Gehlen had been lost, but he could still be embarrassed. It was no longer possible to make use of his complicated jockeying with political rivals, but he might still have certain political dreams which could be played upon. The fundamental theme of Soviet policy in Germany, now stronger than ever, was neutralization, and as West Germany's economic and military status increased the KGB moved correspondingly to support its own government, not simply with the collection of information or the parrying of its enemy's operations, but by mounting a number of "influence" or "inspirational" operations, some of which filtered through Felfe's fingers.

SECRET NO FOREIGN DISSEM (who was also an ex-5D officer)

With the help of the LENA case - and in spite of its potential dangers and the distrust of Dr. 0 Herder - Felfe had established himself in the headquarters organization fairly solidly by 1955 as the most energetic, aggressive case officer working on the Soviet intelligence target. In late 1956 or early 1957 he succeeded Reile as deputy chief (in practice the real chief) of the Soviet, Section of the CE Group. Broadening of Felfe's access became a primary objective. Alfred's factual EEI for the period 1956-59 reflect the KGB need for detailed organizational and personnel information on the BND and its liaison partners: the internal security service, the military security service, the Foreign Ministry, the Chancellor's Office and, among the Americans, primarily CIA. Alfred's purpose was mainly protective: of Soviet installations in Bonn and East Berlin and of the operations run from them. USSR internal security requirements were reflected, too, in requests for Felfe to develop information on the BND section running penetrations into the Soviet Union and to outline Foreign Office security procedures for the German Embassy in Moscow. In general, Felfe and Clemens were expected to warn the Soviets of any projected operation against them. They were also given specific names to check.

With a better bureaucratic position and the allure of being an "expert," Felfe had considerably more maneuverability in his own right after 1956. In addition he was enterprising and his talent for elicitation was phenomenal. He made a practice of winning a personal contact in every important Federal and Land Security Office: more than one security official has ruefully admitted that he used to brief Felfe regularly and informally on his cases in order to get the expert's opinion. And where he could not develop an already existing contact he would try to insert one in the guise of a "special connection." Wherever Felfe had to visit another government agency on BND business he would look up other contacts in the area just to keep up with what was going on. After a while he devised the practice of taking along a tape recorder so that he could cover more ground efficiently. Soon BND colleagues found this a handy way of having him take care of some of their liaison for them, and he was eventually relaying questions and answers on various matters concerning Soviet, satellite and Communist Party operations of the BND and BfV which otherwise were not of official concern to him. From the BND's own damage assessment we have the characterization of Felfe during this period as "shamelessly curious."

Clemens in the meantime had been transferred to Cologne to work in one of the new units targeted against the Soviets in Bonn. His unit

- 52 -

^{*}An interesting example of this kind of maneuver by Felfe involves a man named Max Klemm, a former SS officer and late returner from Soviet PW camp. Felfe was instrumental in having Klemm taken on as an agent by the BND and in having him get a job in the Office of the Federal Chancellor. Felfe argued that such a person as Klemm on the Chancellor's payroll would probably attract a Soviet recruitment attempt. The BND (Felfe) could then monitor the operation for "security purposes"! Somehow Felfe succeeded in selling this idea to his superiors, but there was never any sign of a Soviet approach. (There are various possible explanations of Felfe's motive for inserting Klemm into the Chancellor's office. It may have been simply to use him as an unwitting source on this office. A more ominous speculation is that Klemm was a KGB agent, and that Felfe devised the BND operation utilizing Klemm as cover for moving him into a sensitive job and ensuring all concerned of his "security.") Klemm later became the BND liaison officer to the Security Group (SG), the unit responsible for security of high governmental officials and the executive action arm for espionage and subversion cases of the Chief Federal Prosecutor.

was designed to penetrate (primarily by sudio installation) the Soviet Trade Delegation, and it worked in tandem with a corresponding unit directed by the BTV against the Soviet Embassy. Felfe could learn such about these operations from Clamens, and in any case, as a CE staff officer he had the right to review certain relevant cases from time to time. Felfe's involvement with these operations increased steedily, so that by late 1959 he was officially responsible for the headquarters supervision of mearly all BED operations against the Soviets in Germany. The RGB could well congratulate itself. At the same time it had to be willing and nimble emough to counter the Western efforts on a broad scale without endangering its source.

a. Targeting of CIA, Provocation, Tactical Deception

The LEKA case also helped to break ground at liaison with CIA on operations against Soviet installations in East Berlin. The CIA Berlin Operations Base, which handled these operations, still emjoyed the possibility of working unilaterally. The HWD naturally wented badly to have its share of sources in Marlshorst, the seat of MSB Headquarters in East Germany, and Felfe strove with a variety of plays to further both the BND's and the KGB's cause. In September 1956 Felfe and Reile visited in Washington group. During this visit Felfe gave a talk on the IEMA case, describing it as clean, one of the best operations the HMD had, and practically a penetration of the KFB itself. The IEMA case had at this time begun to produce sizeable amounts of information on NUB facilities in Marlahorst safe house addresses, license plate numbers, telephone numbers, etc. and in June 1956 the Berlin Base Soviet operations chief had discussed the casewith Felfe, offering full support in evaluating and checking out LEMA's information. Felfe agreed to supply all the positive operational detail obtained by IENA through normal EMP-CIA channels, and he also offered, off-the-record, to pass whatever sensitive information he received affecting West German security if we would agree to be very discreet about it. We responded with elecrity. Not only did we wish to keep our foot in the door now that the newly legalized BMD was often eager to dispense with us, we hoped that through this case we could induce the apparently clumsy and unprofessional KUB case officer, Shchukin to defect. Even more important was the necessary to have as many sources as possible within Soviet controlled teritory such as Karlshorst who could give us Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328

"carly warning" information on any major Soviet retreat or redisposition in East Germany. (The Soviets showed their goodwill in this respect by letting LEMA give a whole twenty-four hour advance notice of the East German-USSR Troop Agreements, and again by giving some spurious indications of alleged Soviet withdrawals from the Karlshorst Compound in 1957.) The by-product of ecoperation on the LEMA case was to indicate more of less unavoidably that CIA had a certain coverage of the Karlshorst Compound. A similar process was repeated in another operation which had been run by the RMD against the Soviet Trade Delegation Polyclinic in Karlshorst and which produced an enormous quantity of personality information on the Trade Delegation and on some intelligence officers under Trade Delegation cover. In late 1956 Berlin Base offered full support to this operation, which was eventually to follow the almost classic pattern of suddenly turning into a CE case and being put into Felfe's hands.

In 1958 Felfe began a concerted empaign to collect detailed information from CIA on its Karlshorst penetration program. To this end he engineered a series of crises in CIA-HED relationships which resulted in his being briefed by CIA on the status of its effort. The first of these briefings without BND approval, occured in May 1958. In October 1958 Felfe tried unofficially to get enother with the chief of Berlin Base, while the chief of Berl down. A second official briefing followed in February 1959 and a third in July 1959. At this point a machanism was created for close, continued official PMD-CIA cooperation against Karlshorst. A PMD case officer was placed in the U.S. Army Berlin Compound and worked closely with Berlin Base limison officers. This was an important and delicate step since the BED representative had to be documented as a U.S. Army Berlin Command employee, supplied with an automobile with U.S. Forces license plates and other American Army support facilities. Felfe in turn became the BED headquarters' supervisor for the now officeal BED Karlshorst penetration program and the immediate supervisor of the RED case officer in the Berlin Command compound.

At a meeting with Alfred in Berlin in December 1959, Felie discussed the CIA operations against Earlshorst. He said he had been making some headway in discovering what the Americans were up to, but as yet they were not revealing their sources to him. Alfred proposed that he "help" the Americans by sending some sources for them to recruit, but Felie claims, as he naturally would, that he tried to discourage this. planted recruits were of course uncovered by CIA, but not through Felfe's admissions, so we have no great that they were manipulated in direct support of Felfe. In other cases, Felfe's role & somewhat claurer.

replies In mid-1957, Felfe had discovered through traces on some of the MIB safehouses in the LENA case, that Berlin Base had an excellent source in the Karlshorst Housing Administration. (A source in this spot was able to provide considerable "order of bettle" information on a variety of Soviet agencies, including the intelligence services, through regular monthly reporting on Soviet billeting assignments. This source that been one of Berlin Base's major Karlshorst assets for some years.) By 1959 the Soviets had appearently succeeded in identifying the CIA source, and At that time one of Felfe's colleagues succeeded in recruiting this source's co-worker in the Housing Administration. After this, we began to note that our source's access to information was slowly diminishing. We presume the KDB decided to leave her alone in order to protect their source (Felfe), but restricted her access in order to minimise the amount of harm she could cause. We know her ectivities were closely monitored. Although and know East German surveillants watched her come to West Berlin for meetings with her CIA case officers, she was eventually allowed to reduge to West Berlin. Shortly after she fled, the HMD recruit, who may well have been KGB-controlled, claimed to have received an anonymous varning and also fled to West Berlin. Thus the Housing administration was purged.

In several other cases we have been able to determine that within a certain period of time, ranging from two to nine months after an agent or prospective recruit had been identified to Felfe, the agent was either arrested, or simply disappeared from sight, or lost access to our target. In one case when Felfe, suspected CIA had an agent in another East Berlin housing office, Felfe, with KIB assistance, boldly provoked confirmation of this fact by trying to recruit one of our agent's colleagues. He placed an ed in the West Berlin newspapers designed to attract secretarial help from the East Sector. Our agent's secretary answered it (at KIB behest) and Felfe announced to us that he intended to recruit her as a BND source on told Felfe. We wast then the agent since it might endanger our agent -- who already covered the target in any case. As a result of such aggressive manipulation by Felfe and the KGB, the hitherto unilateral Berlin

Proce modely

Hell was erected on 13 August 1961, however, the Soviets refrained from arresting or doubling many of the agents involved, presumably to avoid generating suspicion or any risk to Felfe. After the Wall, however, when these agents could no longer visit West Berlin for personal neatings with their CIA case officers, the Coviets and/or MTS did move in and bring these agents under control. The agents who were able to maintain clandestine communications with Berlin Michael after the Wall soon should definite signs of hostile control.

. The KGB also manipulated Felfe in support of its investigation of other suspected CIA operations inside the Soviet Union. One case, which occurred in 1960, involved a West German businessman recruited by Berlin Base to report on Soviet trade contacts during his frequent visits to the USSR. This businessman was subsequently recruited, by the KGB, independent of the Berlin Base recruitment, and targeted against the West German and U.S. Embassies in Moscow. When the KGB suspected him of having Western intelligence contacts, they reacted by closing out all the agent's KGB requirements except one. namely, to spot, recruit and maneuver into place a West German girl suitable to be a German Embassy secretary. By this maneuver of introducing a CE factor urgently affecting West German security, the KGB succeeded not only in forcing revelation of the case to the BND, but an actual turnover of the case to the BND. Felfe became the BND Headquarters case officer, and the KGB continued to play the operation for the purpose of identifying other BND assets inside the USSR. In another case, that of a West German woman run by CIA, Felfe provoked revelation of our interest by sending us reports accusing her of seriously insecure behaviour while she was in Moscow. Subsequently, she became the target of an apparent KGB "dangle" operation -- a Soviet lover was introduced whometer appear potentially recruitable.

The Berlin Wall made KGB CI work in Berlin considerably easier. but it did nothing for the Soviet diplomatic and trade installations in West Germany. In the West the problems of negating German and American counterintelligence operations without revealing the existence of a major leak were more difficult. Paradoxically,

- 55 -

Felfe himself had been largely responsible for promoting an operation to tap Soviet Embassy telephones in Bonn. The KGB regarded this situation in a fairly relaxed manner, however: Felfe kept them supplied with information from the transcripts.* Presumably it gave the KGB a good security check on the Embassy employees as well as a convenient deception channel: and, of course, they knew precisely which Soviet offices were not tapped and, therefore, safe. The Kirpichev case, described below, contains examples of the deliberate use, as well as of the careful avoidance, of tapped wires for operational purposes. For different, and obvious reasons, the KGB was also Quite sanguine about the joint BND-CIA audio operation against the New China News Agency. Felfe reported to the KGB on this operation and it remained moderatley successful from our point of view. But, while the KGB seems to have been willing to allow us a passive coverage of thert official installations through telephone taps, it was somewhat more energetic in trying to counter, action operations against their own installations and personnel, and in frustrating Western agent operations mounted on the basis of the audio product. By procrastinating bureaucratically Felfe could foil many a plan. If this did not work, then the audio equipment would often fail technically for some unexplained reason, although in no given case could the failure be positively ascribed to anything but accident. In other cases, the target of the audio operation would suddenly be moved to another billet at the last minute after the audio installation had been completed, and an employee of no great interest to us would be assigned to the wired apartment in his stead. In some cases, however, the defensive ploys had to be more complicated, and sometimes they did not succeed. Two of the best known examples concerned the Soviet intelligence officers, Kirpichev and Pripoltsev.

Omitriy Ivanovich Kirpichev was a KGB operations officer assigned to West Germany under cover of the Soviet Freight and Transport Office, SOVAG, in Hamburg. Kirpichev had been in contact with a Soviet emigre residing in West Germany, who, in turn, was reporting on his contact to the EfV. Kirpichev had been under surveillance by the BfV in an effort to establish some legally incriminating material which might serve as the a basis for an arrest. Felfe says he learned of this case and of a plan to arrest Kirpichev at a routine Bhb-BfV conference sometime in the first half of February 1961. On 11 February he had a meeting with Alfred in Berlin, at which time he informed the KGB about the Kirpichev case. Alfred then asked Felfe (according to Felfe) if he thought it would endanger Felfe if the Soviets "undertook something" to protect Kirpichev. Felfe says he replied in the negative, as long as the Soviet counter-operation were carried out "with the necessary finesse". He even suggested the idea of having Kirpichev pretend to fall sick while on a trip to Berlin.

Immediately after this, on 16 February, Felfe had a conference with the BfV referent for work on the Soviet Embassy. From him he learned the details of Kirpichev's emigre operation, including the emigre's KUB covername, "KRITIK", and the fact the arrest was to take place soon. Felfe reported this to Alfred in secret writing. At the time, he knew that the police planned to interrogate KRITIK formally on 21 February for the purpose of preparing the legal basis for the subsequent arrest of Kirpichev in Hamburg. He may or may not have been sware that the arrest was definitely planned for the 23rd.

On the afternoon of 21 February Kirpichev left Hamburg and travelled to Bonn, where he spent the night in a hotel near the Soviet Embassy. Prior to his departure, various Soviet offices indicated that Eirpichev was about to leave on a business trip to Burlin, but would return to Hamburg on the 23rd of February. The BWD taxons expensation on the Trade Mission produced this information, as the KGB knew it would, and Felfe sent it on to the BfV. Kirpichev proceeded to Barlin on the 22nd. The 23rd came and went with no arrest. A few days later Kirpichev's wife in Hamburg made some remarks on the SOVAG premises, where a BWD agent was employed, which "explained" why her husband had not returned to Hamburg. Presumably this agent was known to the KUB; in any case, Kiryicheva took care that he overheard her saying that her husband was severely ill in Berlin. Two more days passed and the BRD agent in SOVAG was able to report the receipt by that agency of an official announcement from Berlin that Kirpichev had been stricken by an inflamed appendix and confined to a Berlin hospital. Felfe sent this report to the BfV in a routine manner. On the 16th of March this report was "confirmed" in a telephone call between the Soviet Embassy in East Barlin and the Soviet Trade Mission in Cologne. Now all that remained for the MGB to do was to give the BfV and the BMD a specific reason on which to pin the entire failure of the Kirpichev operation, and which at the same time might head off any potentially dangerous general inquiry. Kirpicheva let the BMD source in SOVAG hear her remark that she had been under surveillance in Hamburg by an unknown person. Meanwhile the BfV's double-agent, KRITEK received a semaphrahandal message from Kirpichev warning him that they had been under surveillance during Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328 their last meeting and that Kirpichev had fled West Germany for security reasons. Felfe informed the BfV of the SOVAG penetration agent's report; the BfV sent him the item about Kirpichev's message to KRITIK, and it seemed as though the operators had only themselves to blame for everything. Although after his arrest Felfe tried to give the impression that he had not given this operation eway in the first place, he was obviously interested in seeing it work out well for the KDB. According to Clemens, Felfe asked him some time in 1961 to ask Alfred "if everything worked out and Kirpichev got out all right." Clemens said Alfred enswered in the affirmative.

An interesting side light on the modus operandi in this case is that in its earlier stages (before Felfe had reported to the KGB that KRITIK was a double-agent), the KGB provided KRITIK with an emergency contact whom he could reach by telephone in the Press Section of the Soviet Embassy. The significance of this is that the Press Section was housed in a separate building from the rest of the Embassy and the KGB knew, through Felfe, that it was not tapped, unlike the offices of KRITIK's regular case officer.

Not so successful was the Pripoltsev case. Valentin Aleksendrovich Pripoltsev was an engineer assigned to the Soviet Trade Mission in Cologne. The BfV had uncovered Pripoltsev's role as case officer in three cases which it was monitoring. Felfe learned of this first in May 1961 at a routine interagency conference. In July, at a second conference, he learned that the BfV was thinking of making an arrest. The date of the planned arrest was, however, a closely guarded secret. Felfe learned it on 24 August, only two days in advance of the arrest date. The result was that he was unable to warn Alfred in time. Pripoltsev was arrested and sentenced to four years in prison on charges of espionage. Felfe in turn received a reprimend from the KGB. (This event became another cause for the KGB's subsequent insistence on a faster communications system through the use of an Illegal.) Felfe made some sort of effort, however. As soon as he heard of the date for the arrest he sent a telex to the Cologne office of the HMD suggesting, on his own initiative, that it have a Russian linguist standing by. In doing this he used a cryptographic reference in a strange way which revealed the name of the Soviet to be arrested. The BMD subsequently surmised that Felfe could have done this to alert Clemens or simply to extend the range of knowledge of the planned arrest in order to cover himself in the event that Pripoltsev disappeared before Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328

Another operation, known as the Sokolov case, demonstrates Felfe's usefulness in matters of Soviet internal security. During 1959 and 1960, in the course of investigating an insecure RU officer, Felfe and Alfred managed to direct a series of provocations in such a manner as to involve nearly every German and American intelligence service in West Germany together in one anti-Soviet case, thus giving the KOB a remarkable insight into the limison pratices of the Western agencies. This case is treated in some detail in Annex C. It is another excellent example of operational deception very intricate, well-timed deception, complete with appearent confirmations and cross-checks of information and real sacrifices of agents and equipment. The primary goal of the KIB in this affair was to investigate and entrap Sokolov, an insecure and potentially treasonous RU officer who had been operating for some years against US, air bases in West Germany. The case can also be reed as an illustration of the KGB mission to investigate the security of its military intelligence colleagues. By creating, or elaborating upon, various double agent operations involving Sokolov, the KIB was instrumental in provoking operational interest in him and his West German agent net on the part of the BfV., two Liv's, the BED, and CIA (both on its own, and in its capacity as limison representative for CIC and OSI interests). By inserting into BED spotting channels an agent who claimed to be Sokolov's mistress; , as well as his agent, and who hinted that he might be defectable, the KGB put the BMD in a position to imagine the creation of, and then to monitor, a joint task force consisting of representatives of all the interested services. For six months the German and American representatives operated in close, daily limison to prepare the hoped-for defection of Sokolov and capture of his West German agents. This constitued a bureaucratic tour de force which put Felfe at the center of what was virtually a sort of central clearance mechanism for the handling of this case. This experiment in close inter-service coordination proceeded to the general satisfaction of all parties concerned. The prometion and monitoring of this coordination process was probably one of the specific KDB objectives in the Sokolov operation. There is no doubt that a continuing system for exchange of information on double agent cases, with Felfe in a position to menitor it, would have satisfied the Soviets enormously. We also know that General Gribanov, chief of the KUB's Internal Counterintelligence Birectorate, while briefing Soviet and satellite CI officers in late 1958 and early 1959, stressed the need to collect information and documentation on "coordination" among the Western services which could be exploited propagandistically against them.*

In the course of the Sokolov operation, each participant had considerable opportunity to learn about the other services bureaucratic and operational methods, and considerable amounts of background information were exchanged. CIA, as usual, was the most prolific, furnishing traces and organizational information # the Soviet intelligence services. Felfe's role throughout was unusually passive (his colleagues remarked later on his atypical behavior), although he did try during a certain period to persuade his colleagues to try to "recruit" Sokolov, rather than to concentrate on his defection. Felfors Indeed, as the RED significantly remarked after his arrest, was principal role was just to sit back and let himself be briefed by all sides. When it came time to begin the executive action phase of the operation, the roll-up of Sokolov's net went very well: five agents were arrested, many more suspects identified, and considerable espionage gear, including ome of the newest Soviet W/T sets, was captured. Not so successful, however, were the efforts to defect Sokolov. This was not in the KBB interest, and each time we tried to move closer to him he would be "in the hospital" or otherwise out of reach. It was in the KGB's interest, however, to allow the West Germans to arrost, along with Sokolov's other agents, the woman who pupported to be his mistress. (Despite her willingness in helping her Western handlers to try to defect Sokolov, she failed ultimately to convine them of her bona fides.) Her testimony described Sokolov's insecure behavior and his "Western tendencies"// Felfe states that he sent a copy of her testimony (or excerpts therefrom) to Alfred, and one assumes that from there it found its way to the Soviet military prosecutor.

Clamens - always a little slower than Felfe - was shocked that Alfred had let this agent be arrested by the West Germans, indeed had deliberately let her welk into a trap. Alfred's reply to him was to shrug andsay: "this had nothing to do with my office," and "Sokolov will certainly be arrested."

Felfe admitted that he had observed this case with some glee and was assessed to deliver derogatory information to the KDB about the RU officer. He received a bonus from the KBB of 1,000 DM for his efforts. His West German prosecutors thought it was strange that he should receive a bonus in a case which had actually been a "failure" for the Soviets, e.g. five RU agents arrested. Felfe probably found this assising, too, as he merely replied that he had been compensated for hard work despite the "losses" suffered.

American D and E describe two other cases -- ZUVERSECHT and MERKATOR -- which show that happens when the opposition learns that entered its operations has been doubled. The one of these cases, the operation limped along in desultory fashion for quite a few years, and Felfe used the case to support his contention of opposition incompetence. The other case was exploited more aggressively as a channel for passing both political and counterintalligeness disinformation.

b. Support of Seviet Policy and Political Seception

While Felfe could serve admirably as watching for KIB assets in Germany, Soviet media on a communicat breaker level after 1955 had also created for him a private role on the political scene, which in some ways might have provided him any even grater sense of emeterance importance that did his buresucratic camisciance. ISMA - as ever - provides a clue. During the period of legalization and reorganization in the BMD, the LENA case had been dorment, possibly sleeping off Dr. Herder's probing criticises. In mid-1956 it suddanly swoke, but this time in the guise of a political case. Shehukin told LEMA to forget temporemily about his net to penetrate the Foreign Office and to concentrate on investigating the existence of a passible neutralist faction in West Germany. Shehakin said that the Seviets were doing everything in their power to establish a neutralist party which would make some dent in the 1957 vote for Adenauer. (then election time came, however, he admitted that the Soviets did not have this capability: he said they had no assets for starting a political perty!) Soviet interest in IENA's task wared and waned several times during the year between the summer of 1956 and the summer of 1957, but as tension began to grow in the West about the imminent unveiling of a Soviet ICHM and over the Bast German troop agreements, LEMA's case officer spoke more urgently of the neutralist Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328

LEMA which he said he considered very significant: the KUB wanted LEMA to find out if there did indeed exist in the West German government a faction advocating closer repport with the East German government and with the USSR. Mothing very much came To this item of "intelligence". It was not treated significantly for a variety of reasons, not the least of which had to do with CIA's increasing bafflement with the LEMA case as a whole and increasing speculation that it might be a deception. As an indication of KUB operational intent, however, it is interesting. After this, LEMA returned briefly to work on the Bonn penetration project, but in early 1958 was told definitely by the KUB to ease out of it and to devote himself entirely to political reporting.

Simultaneously, Felfe was involved in another KDB attempt to support its government's policy. The Rapacki proposals for a nuclear-free Central Europe had come to maught with the successful pessage by the Bundestag in U.S. March 1958 of a resolution favoring nuclear essentiate in West Germany. Hevertheless, Soviet clandestine feelers for some kind of rapprochement were still out. We can see a small excesple in one of Felfe's operations. How since the early 1950's, the Soviets had been interested in the ex-Wehrmacht officer. Boguslav von Bomin. Von Bomin was a wallaspoken, and out-spoken, neutralist, with excellent social connections, strong idealism and rather little political acumen. He had been chief of the military planning section of the Amt Blank, the predecessor organization of the Defense Ministry, and in 1955 he had been dismissed from the Defense Ministry for publicly propounding his neutralist views. At that time the KGB, through Colonel-General Aleksendr Pavlovich Tarasov, Chief of Staff of the Soviet Forces in Germany, invited him to come to East Berlin to discusse the German problem. He went, was delighted with Deneral Tarasov, left him his notes on his thoughts, but violently repudiated a direct recruitment pitch from a KGB representative. Gen. Gehlen, who had been in touch with von Bonin on and off for several years, backed him in his trip to East Berlin. Although he realized von Bonin's basic political naivete, he had hoped to use him: in some way to further an old personal dresm; that he could shaehow be instrumental in bringing about a rapprochement, if not a reunification, of his country through a personal channel to the other side. Felfe was Gehlen's personal representative in dealing with von Bonin.*

^{*}Felfe stated to his American interrojetors that he thought the von Bonin case was a good example of a Soviet "political operation run by CE methods." He added his opinion that the Soviets, in running this type of operation against the HMD, were under the impression that the END played a far more important role in the German polipproved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328 play.

SECRET TO FOREIGN DISEMM

In the fall of 1958 the von Bonin case was raised again from the Soviet side. In that year Felfe had three important meetings with the KUB. The first, in Berlin, was with Alfred, and was designed primarily to introduce a faster communication system by means of OWVI. Through the new radio system Felfe was summoned to Vienns in September 1958 to meet a new and imposing person introduced simply as "the director", The following month he met the director again in Berlin. Felfe will not tell use in detail or in any kind of organized fashion about these meetings, but he does convey that the basic operational reason for them was to discuss von Bonin. Felie says the director asked his advice about what to do with this case; if Felfe thought it would be advisable for the Soviets to extend another invitation for talks to von Bmin. These meetings seem to have made a great impression on Felfe. He speaks of the director almost with reverence. Certainly this man appealed to Felfe intellectually, and he obviously cultivated Felfe's not insignificant ego. Felfe told Clemens when he returned from the Berlin meeting that he and the director had talked at length of many "deep and important" things. To his interrogators, Felfe presented the topic of the director's talk as though it vers a kind of comment policy statement. Actually, we should, the circumstances, consider it also in terms of a kind of propagada outline. The director began with a discussion of historical Russian respect for Germany. He said that Soviets realized the impossibility of making West Germany into a Communist country, but that this was all the more reason why everyone should try to seek agreement, to find some guarantee of peace. The Soviets were disappointed, he said, that the contacts statted by Adenauer on his trip to the USSR in 1955 had not been followed up. There now seemed Now the Soviets must try to seek unofficial contacts little likelihood of success on the official diplomatic contacts. intelligence chiefs should maintain satisfactory contact with each other. There were distinct possibilities in this direction, and "the doors were always open." This is all Felfe tells us, but in the context of the von Bonin operation it suggests much. It also looks as though information passed in the one case, IRMA, namely that the Soviets were sincerely interested in a peaceful solution in Germany, was produced to confirm the rightness of Gen. Gehlen's intestions in the other case, von Bonin. These are but small details one would expect to find many more - of the peace message which has often been played against the louder themes of more warlike Soviet statements. About three weeks after the directors's meeting with Felfe on the Von Bonin case, the Soviet government made its first threatening statement of the Pelfe says that the director wasterness urgedhim to develop his political reporting - even to join the Foreign Office (although this last comment might be one of Felfe's own embellishments rather than a real KGB idea). The director urged Felfe to speed up his political reporting, particularly the transmittal of EMD and BfV weekly and monthly situation reports, which he had begun to send regularly in about March 1958. He also asked for information on the EMD offices concerned with political intelligence collection on areas other than the Soviet Union.

c. Methods of Communication

In addition to increased concentration on the political scene, the 1958 meetings between Felfe and Clemens and their KUB mentor also brought about important developments in the agents method of communication with the KGB. It will be recalled that in 1952 Alred set up the BANGMAR case to provide cover for Clemens to make regular trips to West Berlin on HMD business, and that during these trips Clemens went over to East Berlin for meetings with Alfred. After the BAINHASAR case collapsed in fall of 1955, Erwin Tiebel, who had been more or less in reserve since his recruitment, took over as courier between West Germany and Alfred in Berlin. Upon occasion, however, Felfe and Clemens also travelled clandestinely to Berlin, despite the risks which such trips entailed. For these trips, Alfred supplied all three agents with West German identity documents in other names (completely valid documents, unlike the obviously forged product in the LENA case) and suitcases with a false panel to conceal reports and film. The agent would then drive through the East Zone, holding a quick meeting with Alfred at a predesignated kilometer marker (Km. Stone 107) on the Right years later, the von Bonin case was dredged up by the Soviets on yet a third occasion, this time as a propagands weapon to discredit Gen. Gehlen and the MMD. In December 1965, the Meseow correspondent of Der Spiegel magazine, the West German equivalent of Time or Newsweek, was, on Soviet initiative, given an interview by a Soviet Colonel Karpov. The ostensible purpose of the interview was for Col. Karpov to provide derogatory information on whom he claimed to have known personally, Communication and to attack the book "The Penkovskiy Papers." Mear the end of the interview, however, Col. Karpov casually mentioned that he was not unknown in West Germany, and in response to questions from the correspondent (who is reportedly a KMB agent), Karpov then proceeded to reveal that he was the individual who had met with Gen. Gehlen's personal representative (Von Bonin) when Gehlen initiated contact with the Soviet military leadership in East Germany in 1955. Karpov's account of this operation was tailored to give the impression Gen. Gehlen had initiated secret discussions with the Soviets on the German problem without the knowledge of either the West German or the U.S. governments. The interview, together with BMD rebuttal, appeared in the 10 January 1966 issue of Der Spiegel.

Helmstedt-Berlin Autobahn inside East Germany, to pass him documentary or other incriminating material. The agents then proceeded normally into West Berlin and met Alfred later for a lengthy meeting in Kurlshorst. Clemens at this time (1956) had also been given an S/W system and a code system for using one-time pads. This procedure was fairly satisfactory, but Clemens had to less chance of lengthy oral reporting to Alfred, while at the same time the volume of reporting increased. Felfe had begun to rely more and more on the tape recorder (he was apparently very lazy about composing written reports, and several instances of Alfred's impatience with him in this respect are documented), and his reporting consisted primarily of a handful of rolls of Minox film and several spools of tape on which (according to Clemens) he recorded situation reports and the latest changes in IMD personnel and T/O. Scartimes he would visit Clemens in Cologne, where he would dictate a report in cipher which Clemens would then transpose into S/W. This worked well enough until March 1958, when Clauses was unexpectedly relieved of his post in the Cologne penetration unit and demoted to a surveillance team. Clemens' superiors in END headquarters had apparently been dissatisfied with his work for some time. Now his usefulness to Felfe and to the KOB was sharply curtailed. He claims that Alfred was uninterested in the information he was able to develop from most of his surveillance activities (primarily against numbers of the Algerian independence movement in Germany). At this point OWVL was introduced. Clamens acted as the receiver and decoder. Communication was made once a week, with one alternate per week as well. After a while, a "burst" transmission method was introduced, for which Clamens had to use a tape recorder hooked to his radio. After recording the high-speed transmission, he would play the three should play then decipher the message. At one the tape at slow-speed and the time Alfred wanted to introduce a system of rubbing metal shavings onto the tage so that the impressions would become visible, but Clemens and Felfe found this method too messy and too unreliable and refused to use it.

Clemens says that from 1958 on he received very few personal instructions from Alfred and that the majority of the messages were for Felfe. In short, he had become largely a support agent for Felfe. When he did go to Berlin after this date it was usualliminate (until 1960, when Felfe was able to bring him back briefly to an operational role in a double agent case). Alfred tightened up the security by refusing to let Clemens come to the East Sector of Berlin any longer. repeatedly - with only occasional success - to bring Clemens into a case in order to give him legal excuses to go to Berlin, but the problem of quick, secure communications remained a serious one.

It was as much to this problem as to political matters that the director addressed himself in his September and October 1958 encounters with Felfe. He announced that he wished Felfe and Clemens to sever personal contact with Alfred and the East Berlin Rezidentura and to work from then on solely through an Illegal Rezident in West Germany. They would be introduced to the Illegal, but their primary communication with him would be via dead drops. Each man would have his own set of dead drops and it would no longer be necessary for Felfe to communicate laterally so often with Clemens on KGB business. The director said that any communication via this system would reach Karlshorst within 24 hours. The immediate reaction of Clemens and Felfe was dismay. Their refusal to comply with such a proposal was adamant. They claimed that the introduction of an unknown intermediary between them and Alfred would merely provide more risk of exposure or accident over which they would have no control. The director and Alfred tried to reassure them, saying that the Illegal Rezident was an absolutely reliable person, a Soviet citizen, but the two agents continued to refuse. For the next few years the Soviets allowed them to have their own way.*

Sometime in 1959 Felfe received a new KGB cover name: "Kurt." Clemens became "Hanni," and, along with Tiebel, was referred to in KGB files as part of "Kurt's Team" or of "Operation Kurt." In 1960, during one of his rare visits to Berlin, Clemens was presented with a citation by the KGB in honor of his ten years of service: a letter from the then ^{*}The KGB use of Illegals to handle West German CE operations goes back a long way. Deryabin told us in 1954 that while he was on the German Desk in Moscow in 1952-53, there were plans afoot to set up two such Rezidents. one in Duesseldorf and the other in Munich.

KGB Chairman, Shelepin, and a bonus of 2,000 DM. Felfe also received a letter from Shelepin, and we presume also a bonus, although he did not confess to this.

Alfred held his last meeting with Felfe and Clemens in Vienna in September 1961. At this time he informed his old agents that at the end of the year he would leave Germany for good. This time there was to be no question of whether or not they would work with an Illegal Rezident. Alfred informed Felfe and Clemens that at their next meeting later in the fall they would meet the Rezident, and that after this they would work through dead drops. Each man was to select and set up drops for himself: Felfe in the Munich area, Clemens in the Cologne area. From time to time they would have personal meetings with a KGB case officer in a third country, and if they should ever feel themselves in danger they could go to the Soviet Military Attache in some Western European country other than Germany.

A very rough estimate of the frequency of personal meetings between Felfe and/or Clemens and their KGB case officers during the course of their KGB career is once every three months. But this frequency varied greatly during different stages of the operation, depending upon the availability of cover for travel and the intensity of the operational developments at the time. The personal meetings were, of course, heavily supplemented by impersonal communications.

d. New Directions?

We have seen how Felfe, as chief Soviet counterespionage referent in the BND, was able in the last years of his career to cover Soviet requirements on a variety of levels and a variety of topics. By rigging an operation especially for Felfe, Alfred could force answers from almost any element of the West German government in the guise of "build-up material. By creating certain operational situations or ^{*}A BND comment on this subject conjures up a humorous scene in which Clemens "in the purest Saxon dialect" innocently asked his KGB case officer "who this Shelepin might be." Alfred apparently was really shocked, and Felfe claimed to be annoyed with Alfred for not orienting Clemens better.

SECRET NO FOREIGN DISSEM

complexities, Alfred could help Felfe in his bureaucratic manipulations, indeed even promote the formulation of helpful bureaucratic regulations or precedents. By introducing a Soviet CE factor into any BND case anywhere, the KGB could cause the case to be transferred to the protective custody of Felfe. By introducing a Soviet CE factor urgently affecting German security into the operation of any other agency. German or foreign, the KGB could hope to bring many another case under Felfe's scrutiny. Finally, Felfe, because of his own personal qualities - brashness, inquisitiveness, agressiveness - was able to broaden his access to information in areas in which he had no official excuse to be interested. (In this respect he is reported in one of the BND security investigations as having tried to meddle in a BNO operation involving a West German nuclear scientist - probably in response to a specific request from Alfred.) In the end, Felfe had become much more than just a simple servant of the KGB. (It's doubtful if he ever thought of himself as such.) Evidence from intercepted OWVL broadcasts - as well, of course, as Felfe's own statements - shows that Alfred often asked Felfe for advice about the Soviet handling of certain operations. This included advice on the Soviet handling of EMD-KGB double agents and the timing and tenor of KGB propaganda operations. Felfe had become in many ways something of a consultant to the KGB, as well as an agent.

In spite of the fact that in many ways Felfe had an almost ideal position, there is evidence that in 1960 he was instructed by the KUB to move on to a new job. This was the post of security officer for the BHD Communications Unit. At this time, discussions were underway for the establishment of the RMD as the German communications intelligence authority. Felfe knew that the post of communications security chief was shortly to b scome vacant, through the retirement of its incumbent, and he probably Knew guessed that the job would assume greater importance once the COMINT agreement was signed. He submitted his application for the post early and worked hard to sell himself as the next candidate. In many respects, however, this is a job which might not have interested him as much as his old one, and it is curious that he tried so hard to get it. In his post-arrest statements, he went to great pains to claim that the KGB was definitely against having him transfer, but there is sufficient evidence (including intercepted telephone comments between Felfe and Clemens) to suggest that the opposite is true. If so, then the obvious pessellary Would springs out: Athe KUB eculd not concertably have asked an agent who was de facto chief of the BMD Soviet CE Section to give up this job unless it had a replacement with equal or better access

This raises the difficult problem of "other penetrations", which is suggested all through Felfe's history, and of whose existence, if not identity, we have been informed by various defectors. Felfe, of course, denies that he ever recruited another source. Possibly he did not, but in Goleniewski's opinion, for example, it is impossible that Felfe could have worked for the Soviets for ten years without having tipped another source in the BND to them, and it is very likely that Felfe has an idea of who among his leads became a recruited source. One of Felfe's last operations lands itself to the interpretation that it might have been intended in some respects as a support operation for another CE section genetration. (See the Busch case, described below.) There are also disturbing and mysterious indications in OWVL traffic and in the notebook which Felfe kept so meticulously on his KUB and BND operations.* In addition, there is a variety of names of possible suspects which have been suggested to us through other operations and other sources, particularly those smong Felfe's and Clamens' coterie of ex-SS officers. Finally, there is a general and simplified quality about Alfred's last EEI to Felfe which suggests that they might have been, in part at least, comprehensive instructions for someone else, but here, admittedly, we are allowing ourselves pure speculation.

In Felfe's last meeting with Alfred in Vienna in September 1961, Alfred elaborated on a number of specific questions or themes for Felfe to work on for their next meeting. He gave Felfe a typewritten reminder which listed steps taken by the END after August 13th, as a result of the changed Berlin situation; explanation of certain END operational moves against various Soviet officials in West Germany; further development of the Busch case. Finally, in a rather strange repetition of the obvious EEI which Felfe had already been covering as a matter of course for some years, Alfred listed instructions to report on all END against; to report the contents of all cases run by the END against Soviet installations; to find out more about END lisison with the Lagranger and with NATO, and more about END work against the USSR; and to report new recruitment leads among

WVL traffic to the contained references to someone called "Mantyd."

Manfred appeared to be a cover name. Neither Felfe nor Clamens ever volunteered his as one of their three or four cover names. Clamens simply did not know the name. When Felfe was asked who Manfred was, he reacted violently and strangely. He seemed upset and tried to pretend he didn't know the name, then he somewhat clumsily accepted the interrogator's suggestion that it might have been one of his own cover names. Another strange incident shows Felfe at his coolest and most brazen. In the presence of interrogators who were reviewing his notebook with him, he snatched up a pen and scratched out a name in a sentence reading "according to Schumacher is a Karlshorst source." He refused to divulge the name on the grounds that it was "incriminating"! Various hypotheses as to the name have been made; possibly the closest so far is Raile, since Schumacher did at one time work closely with him.

had been for some time interested in the MMD officer who controlled the agent card files). One would assume that after several years of being instructed to report on these general targets, Pelis would not need a written reminder of them.

Having noted Felfe's effort to get the job of COMINE security chief and raised the question of other penetrations, we will proceed to a description of the Busch case. This was another complicated operational chass match, somewhat on the order of the LEMA case, possibly replacing it to some extent as an operational vehicle. The Busch case had as its immediate purpose to deceive the EMD about its own security. Read side by side with a description of Felfe's effort to be transferred to a new job, and with Alfred's instructions of September 1961, one is left wondaring, at least, if the case might also have been destined as a support in some way for another Soviet CE section penetration.

The Busch case is actually two cases, one superimposed on the other. It is a fascinating example of multiple deception - the more so since it was not entirely successful. On one level it involved a KHB/CE officer (calling himself "Heinz") running a deception operation against the HHD. He had begun with a straight penatration attempt, discovered it to be controlled by the HHD, and then tried to salvage what he could by using the ecomection to pass deception about the state of KDB information on the HHD. At the other end of the operation was a HHD field case officer named Friedrich Busch, who worked under the direction of various HHD Soviet CE section officers to counter the KGB operation with deception material on the HHD.

At a certain point in the operation, when both the BED and the KUB seemed to think it unworthy of further attention, Felfe and Alfred entered - behind the scenes - to direct it in ways which suited their own purpose. On the BED side, Busch was of course unwitting of Felfe's inimical role. On the KUB side, the KUB case officer "Brinz" was allegedly unwitting of Alfred's role. Felfe quotes Alfred as maying, "Busch's case officer has no idea of the real situation" and did not even know Alfred personally. This was a bad situation in some ways: Alfred's mariomette did not always dance the way Alfred wanted him to:

Consequently, Alfred had to ask Felfe to make his BND puppet, Busch, provoke the desired responses from the other KGB officer. Felfe was forced at the same time into the very crude and dangerous business of having to make fabrications to his superiors about Busch's operation. This was Felfe's last great plot; he was arrested in the middle of it and we have no way of knowing exactly where it was supposed to take him, but from the risks which Felfe was willing to take to manipulate this operation, we can conclude that it was destined for an important role. The ostensible purpose, as planned by the BND, was to set up a BND staff officer for KGB recruitment, as a BND deception against the KGB. From Alfred's point of view, we conjecture, it had to do in some way with getting another real KGB staff penetration. A macabre touch of humor in the files is a remark from a BND security officer, before Felfe's arrest, to the effect that Felfe's handling of the Busch operation was so strange it wouldn't even be surprising if Felfe were to suggest himself as the eventual target for KGB recruitment!*

We would like to describe this operation in detail because at nearly every stage of his development, it was replete with signs of danger, which should have been heeded by an alert Western service. Unfortunately, the use of multiple cryptonyms to disguise sources and agents and the fierce compartmentation in the BND in this, as in the LENA and many other cases, prevented anyone from putting two and two together for a long time. To make sure that no one could arrive at the proper conclusions in this case, Felfe charged out all the pertinent file material to himself, and no one else had access to it.

Friedrich Busch was another old Gestapo friend of Clemens from wartime days in Italy. He was also an old acquaintance of Oscar Reile and the protege of Carl Schuetz - Clemens' former chief in Cologne. Clemens recruited Busch for the Gehlen Organization in 1951 - as he had Schuetz - and subsequently Busch worked for a time in GV"L" with Reile and Felfe. His professional history is cloudy at best: while a GV"L" case officer he appears to have tried to run a Soviet double agent case without informing his BND superiors.* When the deception was uncovered he gave a rather lame excuse and was transferred to a non-sensitive job in a field debriefing office. He is described as a weak man who cries under pressure and who is not particularly "quick on his feet." Our files contain a note that Felfe tried at some point to get him a staff position in headquarters, but was unsuccessful.

In early 1956 Oscar Reile brought Busch into an extensive KGB deception operation known by the BND cryptonym "PANOPTIKUM." The first player to fill the lead role in PANOPTIKUM was General Friedrich Panzinger, a former senior officer in the RSHA. He had been in charge of Rote Kapelle investigations for a while, later Chief of SD Ostland (Baltic States and Belorussia). In 1947 he had been captured by the Soviets in Vienna and imprisoned in the Soviet Union on charges of war crimes committed against a Soviet officer. In 1956 he was released on the promise that he would work for the KGB "to penetrate the BND and to report on political events in the Federal Republic." Upon his return to Germany in early 1956 he went directly to an old friend, the President of the Bayarian LfV, to whom he reported the KGB recruitment and who in turn passed him on to the BND in the person of Reile. Reile's plan was to put Panzinger in contact with an ostensible BND net (real people, fabricated activity), about which he could then report to the KGB. When Panzinger happened to become reacquainted with Busch, whom he had known before the war, Reile allowed Panzinger to mention this to the KGB. Panzinger did not know Busch was a BND man until the KGB wrote back telling him to be wary of Busch. Reile ^{}Busch's double agent operation was a typical Soviet operation for the period and possibly significant for the early history of this case: the brother-in-law of a Gehlen employee had run a sort of service in the immediate post-war years assisting former SD personnel to cover their tracks and to find gainful employment. The KGB in Vienna caught on to him and with this compromising knowledge managed to recruit the Gehlen employee. The Gehlen man reported the Soviet recruitment and found himself with Busch as a case officer. Why Busch really tried to play him back without telling anyone is not in CIA records, nor is any description of the content of the play-back, which lasted nearly two years.

then made Busch Panzinger's BND case officer and a deliberate sitting duck for recruitment by the KGB. The case was handled in a desultory fashion by Reile for a while, then by another colleague, until the fall of 1958. when it was given to Felfe. During this two year period nothing much happened. Indeed, Panzinger's K98 case officer, "Heinz," exhibited all the reactions of a very suspicious man. Panzinger met him only once during the two years (in one of the LENA case safehouses in Berlini), and the whole proceeding had come to a near standstill when Felfe moved in.

SECRET NO FOREIGN DISSEM

At this point the case picked up spectacularly. Felfe proposed to the CE section to make Panzinger more attractive to the KGB: he had Panzinger tell Heinz that Busch had asked him to serve as a letter drop for the BND and also that Busch had been made chief of a special HED office handling Baltic and North Sea operations. In February 1959 he had Panzinger ask the KDB for a meeting. As reason for the meeting, Penzinger was to discuss the war crimes charges which hung over his head. The Soviets had released Panzinger without giving him an ammesty and the old General lived in fear of arrest. Actually, sometime previously the MED had arranged with the Bavarian LfV President to brief a high official of the Bavarian Justice Ministry so that no action would be taken against Panzinger as it later turned out without prior warning to the HND. Unfortunately, only one such person in the Justice Ministry was briefed. The KIB appearably been of it, however, since once before when Pansinger had discussed the charges with his KUB case officer, the latter had assured him that his case would never come up. Hevertheless, under Felfe's direction Fenzinger asked the KIB case officer for a meeting to discuss this problem. He traveled to Berlin on 22 February 1959. The KUB case officer told him he would see what he could do about the charges, but did not offer much hope for an emmesty. At the same time, he said he thought Penzinger's case merited a more "secure" ecommunications arrangement and instructed him in the methods of GWVL reception. (Felfe told his Western colleagues with great interest that this was the first BMD double agent to receive OWVL from the NOB.)

Now strange things began to shappen in Panzinger's operation. In East German July he received a KIB instruction via OVVL to find cut if the HVA defector Max Heim had been a BHD or a BIV agent prior to his defection. This was in many ways a very indiscreet question on the part of the KGB. The CIA limits of officer for security matters, who was already on Felfe's trail at this time, wrote the following comments in August 1959:

Soviets it is strange that the KGB seems to think he might have access to this information. If the KGB actually asked the question this could be an indication that the KGB knows Panninger has been turned and calculates that the EMD will supply a true answer. On the other Band...consider the possibility that (Falfe) has been asked this question..."

In the meantime Panzinger had immorantly carried out his KIB case officer's instruction to ask Gehlen, whom he knew slightly, for a job in the BED. He wrote a letter of application and, after an appropriate interval, Felfe drafted an enswer for the signature of one of Gehlen's deputies. Felfe's draft was nothing short of a death blow to the Panzinger operation, and indeed there was speculation even at the time that it was for some reason a deliberate blow. Felfe and his colleagues in the BED and CIA had discussed the type of answer which should be prepared to Panzinger's letter of application and had decided together that a sort of non-committal reply suggesting "no present vacancies" but still holding out some hope would be the best. It appeared strange, then, when Felfe produced the signed reply which stated that Gehlen could sot employ Panzinger until the matter of war crimes charges was settled. The CIA limison officer reporting on this episode wrote:

"Considering the fact that the charge was a very painful thing to Panzinger - as time proved - it seems somewhat unusual and a bit grotesque that Felfe should have written a latter to Panzinger on such a literal basis. Felfe, a fellow alumnus of the RSMA along with Panzinger and Busch, could have prepared a less cold-blooded reply.....We can only speculate as to the reason for the change. At any rate it would seem that (the) other approach would have served to keep the KGB more hopeful and interested and at the same time would not have rubbed salt in old Panzinger wounds."

Four months later a warrant of arrest for war crimes was served on Pansinger, and as the police officers waited for him to collect his belongings he committed suicide by poisoning himself. This occurred on a day in early August 1959, when both Felfe and the one man in the Bavarian Justice Ministry who had been briefed to forestell an arrest were absent. Felfe's comments to a CIA lieison officer made shortly after this are interesting. He said he thought Panzinger had been depressed for some time (this was true) and had shown signs of emotional instability. He had been clearly worried about the war crimes charges. As to the operation, Felfe thought that perhaps the KGB might not regret having him out of the way since in a sense, even though he had been the KGB channel to a BRD officer, he was also an obstacle between the KGB and the BED officer and now the KGB gould approach the latter more directly. The KGB would reason, said Felfe, that through

Panzinger they had been able to gather enough evidence of Busch's "indiscretions" to enable them to make an approach - an approach which earlier they might not have believed possible. In fact, said Felfe, the KUB might now be expected to move against Busch and in doing so they might even go so far as to reveal their knowledge that Busch, too, was a war criminal. (This was the first time this information about Busch became known to CIA.)

While making wise surmises about the KUB to his American colleagues, Felfe set about frantically in the IMD to cause the very contact with Busch which he had been predicting. Shortly after Penzinger's suicide Pelfe and Alfred met in Vienne, where, Felfe admits, Alfred asked him how they could keep the operation going and extend it to Busch. Felfe hit upon the effective and simple plan of having Pensinger's brother write to Panninger's old KGB accommodation address saying he had found the name and address among Penzinger's effects and was informing them of Penzinger's death. The brother invited the addressee to write back either to him or to Penzinger's "closest friend during his last days", i.e. Busch. In this way Busch began corresponding directly with the KIB. A meeting was arranged to take place in Rome in August 1960 during the Olympic Games. An urgent ONVL message from Alfred admonished Felfe to remember that he was responsible for the safety of the KIR officer, who was coming from Moscow for this meeting. The KGB officer, Heinz, told Busch he had been sent from Moscow especially to recruit him, but on BMD instructions Busch played hard-to-get, challenged the KDB officer to provide bona fides, and refused to accept recruitment by anyone but the "boss"/.) They parted with an agreement to meet again in Geneva in early 1961.

Feffe presented this turn of events to the HHD as very remarkable, and he immediately set about the creation of a deception unit on which Busch could report in the event of his recruitment. Some people found this a bit premature, but Felfe kept moving and during the mext few months gave the impression of great activity surrounding the Busch case while he collected all the necessary approvals for Busch to accept a KIB recruitment, to nominate a (real) condidate for KIB recruitment in the headquarters and for the release of deception material. He set Busch up in Heidelberg in an office consisting of Busch, one colleague and a secretary. His theory was that Busch would report freely on this office, thus giving the KIB the impression that they had readded their goal of Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328 penetrating the BED. He reasoned that in this way the BED could keep the KEB busy while fending them off with deception and monitoring the extent of KEB knowledge about the BED: The files show fairly universal feelings of incredulity at the time Felfe propounded his plan. Unfortunately the incredulity did not extend to Felfe's immediate supervisor, the BED CE chief. He was fairly well hoodwinked by Felfe in this case, and in several others, to his intense embarrassment later. Each time the security section officers wented to review the case, they found that the material was inaccessible; finally, in July 1961, one of them was able to get into Felfe's safe and discover, to his amazement, that contrary to all impressions, absolutely nothing had happened in the Busch case since the meeting in Rome a year earlier.

The KGB simply did not appear for the meeting with Busch in Geneva, and no word came from the case officer Heinz suggesting a new meeting. AT the same time, Felfe knew from Alfred that there would be no masting. Via Clamens, Alfred sent the message in early 1961 that Busch's KWB case officer was having difficulty in obtaining documents for a trip to Switzerland. The KIB Heinz was hard to push around, however. One surmises that he was already quite suspicious of Busch and prepared to drop the case. (Rillion rem (It will be recalled that mbered that, according to Alfred, A Heinz was unwitting of the true circumstances of the case.) Heinz would have to be prodded from the West. In May 1961, Busch wrote him a letter saying he was sorry they had missed each other and that if Heins was still interested he should set a new meeting date. Busch stipulated that the place should be anywhere but France, since he was blacklisted in that country. Slightly more than two months went by before Heinz replied offering to meet Busch - in Paris! Now Busch had to write another letter. (A tap on Felfe's telephone, which was already operating by this time, reveals that Felfe informed Clemens about this time that the BMD would not give Busch permission to keep a KGB meeting in Paris. Since Clemens had absolutely no official reason to know this information, one assumes that he was supposed to pass it on to Alfred.

Another six weeks were used up in negotiation for a new meeting. Finally, Busch and Heinz agreed to meet in Vienna on 11 September 1961. At a meeting in Berlin on 10 August, Felfe's own KGB hendlers informed him privately of the new meeting plan. They urged Felfe not to let the BHD countersurveil Busch's meeting with Heinz, since if Heinz, who doesn't know the real situation, were to spot the surveillance he would simply break contact. Nevertheless, the HeID was insistent about the surveillance, various sections for various reason. The CE section wanted to identify Heinz; Felfe wanted an excuse to get Clamans (now in the surveillance unit) a chance to meet with Alfred and to countersurveil Felfe's own meetings with Alfred, and the Security Section and CIA wented to surveil Felfe! To this it must be added that the KUB Heinz had his only countersurveillance; the only man we do not know about is Alfred - possibly he would have done well to have had some surveillance of his own - if he didn't.

When Busch arrived in Vienna, Heinz told him that he was the KGB "boss" for this operation; that he had come again empecially from Moscow and was prepared to offer Busch $10,000 if he would work as a source on the RED. (The money would be paid later into a Swiss Bank account, for which Busch should make his own arrangements.) Busch modestly replied that he doubted if he could be a very good source since he was not a headquarters case officer; had been in a debriefing unit (ignoring the previous fabrications about his work) for some years as a result of earlier difficulties, and actually know no more about the ERD than that which had been published in the East German and Soviet exposes of GV"L" at the time of the great flaps of the early 1950's. Heinz assured him (Fell'e wrote in his report to the BED, "swore to him") that, incredible as it might seem the content of these old exposes was in fact the sum total of KDB knowledge about the BMD and they were hungering for more. He said that Busch was a most important man for the Soviets, and he gave Busch a list of requirements on the END: true names and pseudonyms of case officers: identification of agents in the East; all information about the hendquarters, about bus routes to the headquarters, Had license plate numbers; political and operational information about Berlin. In addition to these penetrating EEI, Heinz made several interesting political observations - much in the old IRMA style. Felfe wrote them up as follows:

"It was said that the Soviets do not understand Adenauer. Because Adenauer doubted the determination of Soviet demands concerning Berlin, and was not ready to negotiate sconer, now, after the 13th of August, his negotiating position is appreciably less favorable than it was before.

"The americans in Moscow were said to be of the same opinion. From them it became known to the Soviet intelligence service that they wanted to force the victory of Brandt in the Bundestag elections or in a general victory of the SPD. In this case the Soviets would then try toosee that Brandt would not become so powerful as Adenauer.

"Khrushchev reportedly will stand on his word: a peace treaty with the 'DDR' can still be signed this year and Berlin become a free city. Otherwise, one can reckon with further difficulties in Berlin."

Heinz sent Busch home with an S/W system, some developer and a test to practice on, and the agreement to meet again in Vienna in April 1962. In the meantime Felfe prepared his report on the case, assessing it as follows:

The continuing patience of the Soviets over the years and their careful procedure underline the repeated statements that everything had been stopped (referring to the hiatus between the Rome and Vienna meetings) for security reasons, since our agent was especially important to them. The S/W system given him and the money paid (500 DM) without receipt support this interpretation. The interest of the Soviets is undoubtedly in this case to penetrate headquarters or at least to develop the possibilities for doing so. For the future handling of this case it is decisive to determine if, and to what extent, build-up material on the BMD, especially about the headquarters, can be passed, and if it would be possible to find an estensibly witting source in the headquarters for our agent, whose our agent could describe in at least a few details."*

When Busch got home he tried out his new S/W: the practice text was in Russian, which he couldn't read and the code consisted of several number groups for which he had no key. His first communication them to the KGB was a rather stinging complaint. As of early November 1961, when Felfe was arrested, there was no reply to Busch; indeed none came until well after it was clear that Felfe's operation was at an end. In January 1962 a routine letter for Busch arrived asking why nothing had been heard from him. This was the end of the Tanaham case. Busch was interrogated

V. Investigation and Arrest

For almost every year of Felfe's post-war existence an item of derogatory information was entered in the files of some Western agency. Unfortunately, no one agency, much less the BMD, had it all until shortly before his arrest. Both Clauses and Felia have praised Soviet security practices as greatly superior to those of the MED, and their account of the KGB handling shows a continuing concern with operational security. The weakness of the Soviet operation cannot be laid so much at Alfred's door as at Pelfe's and Clemens' The weaksess, of course, was built in: the clannishmess and susceptibility of the ex-SD officers which draw them to KGB attention in the first place, also bore the seeds of an eventual breakdown. Felfe and Clauses refused the discipline of maintaining contact via an Illegal, insisted on keeping up their laboral communications and their trips Best to meet the KCB officers. One can at least understand what psychology might have notivated the two agents in their refusal of the impersonal and mechanical communications system, but their stubborness was disastrous, and as time passed their operational practices because more and more lax. What saved them for so long was the fact - over which they had little or no control - that no thorough investigation was ever made of either Felfe or Clemens by any one agency. The MID, hamstrung between the requirements of "respectability" and the need for experienced personnel, did not (at the time Felfe and Clemens were recruited) perform background checks on new employees and did not routinely trace them with other agencies. Instead it tried to rely on rigid internal compartmentation as its primary security technique.

As early as April 1950, British files contained sufficient derogatory information on Felfe to make envone wary at the very least. Aside from information on such general and common post-war sins as the falsification of personal history statements, "insecure" talk, and information peddling to several agencies at once, the British file contained; (a) Felfe's report on Gerda Clemens' attempt to recruit her husband for the KGB in Dresden, an indication that Clemens might have accepted recruitment, and Felfe's offer of Clemens to the British as a double agent; (b) Felfe's admission that he had sent a report on a unit of the LfV Hordrhein-Westfallen to a contact in the SED in East Berlin; (c) a report that Felfe had attempted to peddle to at least two West German news agencies the charter of the proposed BfV which was about to be presented to the Ministry of Finance for Approved for Release: 2019/02/21 C02606328 approval. The history of Felfe's possibly dangerous contacts with Max Wissel and Helmit Probbsting was also recorded in some detail, as well as indications of untrustworthiness, possible theft and general "varnishing of the truth". Some of this information was made available in general terms to the HMD in January 1958, when the HMD requested traces on Felfe in the course of their 1956-57 investigation of him.

CIC had a certain amount of derogatory information on Felfe by the fall of 1954, mostly from Ludwig Albert, who had become aware of the existence of black marks against Felfe in the BfV and the Federal Criminal Office through his own early CI Work. CIC also had the report of Max Wessel's alleged two approaches to Felfe.

By 1956 CIA had what CIC had, although in condensed form, without source description. It also had Deryabin's information in early 1954, which indicated the existence of two KIB agents in the Gehlen Organization with the cover names "Peter" and "Paul" (Clamens' and Felfe's cover names at the time), but unfortunately Derysbin was mable to provide details to help identify the agents.* After 1957, when CIA officers began to work more closely with Felfe, the file of suspicious, or at least puzzling, items about him grew. For example, in February 1957 a CIA officer from the limison base in Mamich/Pullach accompanied Felfe on a trip to Berlin. The purpose of the trip was a special meeting with LENA, at which, Felfe said, he hoped to obtain additional details concerning an earlier LEMA report that the KGB was targeting a homosexual officer of the U.S. Department of State stationed in Berlin.  After Felfe and his CIA lisison officer had already arrived in Berlin, and separated, Berlin Base received a cable indicating that Gen. Gehlen was concerned about Felfe's safety and had requested that he be under CIA's 21 hour-a-day protection. (Was this one of Gehlen's flashes of intuition, and could we have suspected the truth even them? This possibility cannot be rejected out of hand.) After this cable was received, the CIA limison officer, remembering a remark Felfe had made earlier in the day that he intended to go to a mayie at 1830, telephoned Felfe's with no conclusive result.

Revertheless, Deryabin's revelation of the fact of penetration should have led to a review of personnel security practices within the BMD, but it did not. At that point in West German and HATD history, almost any type of investigation into the backgrounds of BED personnel would have turned up deregatory information and possible indications of Soviet connections on the part of a number of Hall employees.  This is a typical diversionary allegation. CIA's Berlin Base and the State Department security office expanded considerable effort to investigate LEMA's report. The investigation lasted well over a year, until it was dropped hotel at 2030 hours. Felfe was not there, nor had he returned by four in the morning when our sleepy officer decided to abandon his vigil.

Located in his hotel at 0800 the next morning, Felfe invited our liaison officer to breakfast. Without being asked to account for his time, Felfe volunteered that he had gone to the movie at 1830, had had something to eat and a drink, and had then gone to another movie at 2230. Again without being asked or challenged, he exhibited two movie tickets. This voluntary display of props to support a story struck the liaison officer as quite unusual. Equally unusual was the fact that the stub was torn off only one of the tickets, and that even if Felfe had in fact attended the second movie it would not have lasted until some time after four o'clock in the morning. The liaison officer did not reveal his suspicions to Felfe, but he did prepare a special

The BND had Ludwig Albert's denunciations of Felfe as early as 1953, but these went unheeded. Albert made a practice of denouncing many of his colleagues who transferred from GV"L" to the headquarters CE units and, furthermore, was not entirely above suspicion himself. The first concerted investigation of Felfe of which we have record was begun by the BND in 1956 on the official grounds of "Suspected SD and Eastern Connections when the BND traced the British in the course of this investigation, they received a memo on 21 January 1958 generally outlining Felfe's insecure and deceptive practices as a British agent and specifically pointing out suspicious contact with Helmut Proebsting and "the RIS attempt to recruit Clemens" The memo did not contain an account of Felfe's having offered Clemens to them as a double agent. In addition, the British pointed out that as late as August 1957 Felfe had attempted to establish an unofficial connection to a British intelligence officer in Duesseldorf. None of this seems to have stirred the BND part- . icularly. Felfe was called in and asked, in a rather pro forma manner, about his SD connections. Felfe, equally pro forms, denied having been an SD officer. The "investigation" seems to have petered out at this point, despite the fact that the falsity of Felfe's statement could have been proven very easily.

KGB had deliberately sacrificed a number of the GV"L" bases, it did not do so without leaving some penetration. The to report on the subsequent CE and CI organization and operations. ND. To find the remaining penetrations, one should look primarily in the dissorbed a number of the old GV"L" officers after the dissolution of that base. In a memo dated in early 1957, this officer suggested several candidates for investigation, among whom were Felfe, Reile, Clemens and Schuetz. His conclusions were given to the BND security section, where they were added to the general suspicions of Felfe and his coterie, but again, unfortunately, did not succeed in sparking any sort of investigative action which might have tested out the logical analysis.*

The security situation continued to fester quietly in this way until early 1959, when finally a report from a high-level penetration source shot us into action. In March 1959, Michal Goleniewski, a senior officer in the Polish Intelligence Service reported to us that the KGB had had two agents in the BND group which visited the U.S. in September 1956. The KGB also had an agent, Goleniewski reported, who was in position to obtain information on a joint American-BND office running operations against the Soviet Embassy in Bonn and against the Soviets traveling in the West. The KGB had guidance papers used by this office and prepared by the Americans in 1956. The original source of this information was the highest level of the KGB: Gen. Gribanov, the Chief of the Internal Counterintelligence Directorate, who revealed this information in a briefing of the assembled satellite intelligence chiefs in 1958. On the basis of this information and several other leads from Goleniewski, and despite some questions concerning Goleniewski's bona fides. CIA began a quiet, closer investigation of suspect KGB agents in the BHD. This investigation centered on Felfe. As a first step, file information was pulled together on Felfe and on the stranger of his operational activities -- the LFNA and Busch cases. He was placed under unilateral CIA surveillance on several of his trips out of town, and a unilateral phone tap was put on his Munich telephone. The BND was not immediately informed because of the extreme sensitivity of the source, Goleniewski, who was still in place.

By early 1961 the circumstantial evidence against Felfe, the positive evaluation of Goleniewski's information in general, and especially the fact that Goleniewski had by then safely defected to the West, brought CIA to the point where it felt it would inform the BMD. When General Gehlen was told in February 1961 of the specific report about two KGB agents in the group which visited the U.S. in 1956, he immediately agreed that his heretofore favorite case officer - Folfe- was the major suspect! He set up a small special task force to investigate Goleniewski's leads to penetration of km the BMD. Now, with the impetus of information from "the horse's mouth," their investigation of Felfe picked up rapidly where it had left off six years previously. The BND noted that Felfe had a weekend house built, suspiciously it seemed, right on the Austrian border, and in mid-March a tap was put on the telephone on this house. This was difficult to achieve because the house was located in an area with virtually no other residents, but as soon as this tap began producing, the KGB's operation "Kurt" unraveled rapidly. The first lead came from a remark by Clamens, who complained to Felfe about the high cost of his phone calls to Felfe: if these had been official calls there would have been no need to complain. The BND then began to look at Clemens more closely and discovered that he was in correspondence with his daughter in Dresden paivia a third person (Tiebel), even though he went to great pains to give the public impression that he had no connection with his East German family. The BND security team also discovered that Felfe had been falsifying his expense accounting, and they noticed his relatively high standard of living. In the summer of 1961 Felfe began dropping remarks about having received a large bequest from a recently deceased aunt in the U.S. CIA checked and found the aunt very much alive and that there was no record of here having made any foreign money transaction. Indeed, a few weeks later fige applied for a passport to make a trip to Germany to visit Felfe, and Felfe then began mentioning a loan instead of a bequest.

clandestine contact with each other on matters which could not be identified with official Gehlen operations.*

They spokke quite openly - very "insecurely" - about Gehlen affairs on the telephone, but double-talked certain other matters. It was also evident that they were corresponding with each other on operational matters of some kand although they had no official BND reason to do so. Mail coverage was placed on Felfe. By piecingtogether various scraps and shavings from the taps and from close observation of Felfe, the BND security officer was able to establish a significant pattern of action on Felfe's part. It became clear that Felfe was always curious and aggressive just after his bi-monthly trips to Cologne. (The investigator drew up an impressive analysis showing how Felfe pushed for information on a subject not normally of direct concern to him - namely the whereabouts of an engine recovered by the BND from wreckage of a Czech owned IL-18 which had crashed in Bavaria - at a time when normal interest in the air crash had died down, but just after one of Felfe's trips to Cologne. Felfe later admitted that the whereabouts of the IL-18 engine had been an urgent EEI from Abfred.) The investigators reached the conclusion that Felfe was receiving his EEI in Cologne via Clemens, who served as a communications link to the East. In August three very damning telephone intercepts revealed that Clemens had been "called" and asked to find out from Felfe what had happened in the Pripoltsev affair. Felfe told Clemens that he had written something about it the previous day, which would be "over there" the following day. By early October it was clear to monitors that Clemens was receiving OWVI, and they were able to establish his frequencies and schedules (every Saturday at noon, alternate repeat on Mondays at 1700 hours). Several messages were subsequently broken when Clemens relinquished his one-time-pads.

In addition to this form of observation, Felfe's more extraordinary operational behavior was being scrutinized as never before. In the LENA case a full scale security review was ordered - the reviewer unaware of the pressing reasons for it, however. Within two months after this order was given the slippery principal of the LENA case, Hofe, announced that him Soviets had lost interest in him and turned him over to the East. The phone tap on Felfe's Munich residence remained generally unproductive.

German service. In Felfe's safe, evidence was found that he had falsified official Registry records on the LENA case. In the Busch case, both CIA and BND investigators watched nervously as Felfe and Clemens prepared to accompany Busch to the 9 September 1961 meeting with the KGB in Vienna.

cIA surveillance of Felfe in Vienna revealed that he took extreme evasive tactics when leaving his hotel at a time when no activity was scheduled in the Busch operation. It was a Sunday morning, when the Vienna streets were quiet. Felfe drove very fast, made several U-turns and crashed a red light. The surveillance team was under instructions to let Felfe go rather than risk being detected. It was later learned that Felfe met with Alfred barely ten minutes after the surveillance had been broken off. Clemens was in his hotel room with a bad cold and could not make the meet with Alfred. (This was unfortunate, as after his arrest he would have given an honest account of what happened at this meeting.)

was convincing enough to prompt the BND to seek the opinion of the Attorney General's office as to the chances for taking executive action against Felfe. On 19 October the Federal Attorney advised that none of the tapping evidence was juridically useful so far, but he advised that the investigation be continued. On the 28th of October, a series of very provocative telephone calls was recorded between Clemens and Felfe. From these calls it emerged that Clemens was having difficulty deciphering a "call from Alfred." Clemens said, "They must have called when I wasn't here," since "several pages seem to have been skipped." When Clemens was at last able to read Alfred's message, he reported to Felfe that Alfred wanted Felfe's advice for the continued direction of a press campaign then being directed by the KGB against the BND regarding the murder of the Ukrainian emigre leader, Stefan Bandera.*

The KGB had already learned from Felfe about planned American and German publicity on this case, and on the basis of Felfe's information and with his guidance were preparing to steal the show with counter publicity of their own. Alfred also wanted Felfe's opinion about the further handling of Fritz Busch's operation. Most important for the investigators, however, was Felfe's news for Clemens that he had just made arrangements for Clemens to accompany Busch to Berlin in mid-November as a counter-surveillant for a meeting Busch was to have with a double agent. Clemens could, therefore, have an opportunity to see Alfred again. Felfe remarked that the double agent didn't know yet that there was to be a meeting, but that Felfe was about to write (to Alfred) to arrange a meeting on the 13th or 14th of Movember. At last it looked as though there would be an opportunity to catch one or the other of the agents with incriminating evidence on him. Furthermore, it seemed certain that Felfe's request to the KGB to make a specific meeting arrangement would produce a response from the KGB in the next scheduled OWVL broadcast. This was to be on Saturday noon, 4 November, or alternately on Monday afternoon at 1700 hours, 6 November. Furthermore, it was likely that Clemens would be telephoning to Felfe immediately after the receipt of the OWVL message to report its contents. Perhaps at this point the much needed legal evidence would appear.

up on Saturday noon. During the afternoon Clemens made three telephone calls to Felfe, the gist of which was that Alfred's message contained more about the press conference, nothing as yet about the new meeting in Berlin, in fact "nothing special;" consequently, Clemens would just send it along to Felfe by registered mail. Thus the weakest link in the KGB's communications channel was presented to us. The opportunity was ideal. The following day, Sunday, saw hurried legal conferences between the BND security chief and the Federal Attorney's office and between CIA and the chief of the mail intercept service (which is under Allied control). The coordination and planning among these offices for Felfe's arrest was superb - not a simple matter, since Felfe's own "special connections" had to be circumvented without arousing ire or suspicion.

At 1030 on Monday morning, & November, Clemens' registered letter to Felfe was officially handed to the BMD and the Federal Attorney. By 1130 the appropriate police officers with BND escort were assembled at the BND headquarters building in Pullach; Felfe had been summoned to the office of a senior BND official on an unalarming pretext; the compound gates were locked, the telephone lines cut; all principals were armed, and the BND doctor was standing by for any emergency. A few minutes later, the arresting officers entered the office in which Felfe was conferring and served their warrant. Felfe's first reaction was to grab for his wallet and attempt to destroy a scrap of paper which was in it. There was a small scuffle: the officers retrieved the paper, subdued Felfe. By an enormous stroke of luck the captured notes turned out to be Alfred's typewritten EEI which Felfe had received in Vienna in September. Felfe refused for several days to make any admissions. Clemens, whose arrest had been carried out in Cologne about eight minutes after Felfe's, began talking immediately and led his arrestors to the place where he had hidden his code pads. Erwin Tiebel was arrested the following day in his home town. Thus ended, nearly ten years to the day, Felfe's career as a West German Intelligence officer. A A A A December as the

VI. The Aftermath

By 8 December 1961 news of the arrests was generally known throughout the West German government. By 12 December it was in the newspapers. The trials took place after lengthy (and from the counterintelligence officer's point of view, unsatisfactory) interrogations in July 1963. Felfe received a sentence of 14 years in prison, Clemens nine years in prison, and Tiebel two years at hard labor. Through his mother in Dresden Feife managed to reestablish contact with the KGB and continued to correspond with the Soviets even from his prison cell. Ever resourceful. Felfe first prepared an S/W system from the alum in his shaving kit; later, he undoubtedly received a better system. From time to time he "recruited" criminals about to be released from jail to smuggle letters out for him. Some letters were intercepted, but others apparently got through, and it is evident that Felfe asked the KGB to send him, suitably concealed in laundry, reading matter, a chess set, etc., various paraphernalia for escape and for clandestine communications. He also asked for poison to be taken in the event the KGB was unable to spring him. He also gave the KGB a fairly comprehensive and self-exonerating damage report -- blaming as much as possible on Clemens. The Soviets on several occasions have attempted to gain Felfe's release in exchange for prisoners in the East. As of the last reporting, Felfe remains confident that he will eventually be pardoned, exchanged, or will manage to escape. His spirits undoubtedly were boosted when George Blake succeeded in escaping from jail in England.

In Felfe's two major deception operations, LENA and Busch, the KGB endeavored to act as naturally as possible after his arrest. Fritz Busch received a routine message in early 1962 asking why he hadn't corresponded lately with the KGB. Guenther Hofe of the LENA case went to elaborate lengths to misconstrue or simply to ignore the danger signals which the BND kept sending him, and he insisted on sending "political intelligence" back to his West German case officers. The KGB even went so far as to let him come to West Germany on one of his regular business trips, at which time he was arrested and interrogated on charges of espionage. He refused to admit KGB control; however, there were enough inconsistencies in his story to bolster the earlier analysis that he had been KGB directed from the beginning. After a brief period in prison, LENA was returned to East Germany in a prisoner exchange agreement. The manner in which the East Germans conducted these negotiations was evidence in itself that LENA was regarded by the East as a person of special importance, whose return was urgently desired. The entire prisoner exchange agreement, which was a big thing and involved well over 1,000 prisoners, was made contingent upon the release of LENA.*

Vert 12 pages will be re-written & largely deleted. One can see in the Felfe case the gradual development of KGB counterintelligence operations. Beginning with the comparatively simple BALTHASAR, KGB deception operations progressed gradually through LENA and LILLI MARLEN to the absurdly convoluted Busch case. The KGB learned during this period to exploit double agent operations in a wide variety of ways. It learned that a staff penetration of a CE office — the recruitment of an officer ^{}Golitsyn reported that in Germany in 1950, double agents were exceptional, but that by 1955 they had become very much in favor. He learned this from an officer who had returned to Moscow from the KGB rezidentura in East Germany. This same officer also commented that there was really nothing much that the Western intelligence services couldn't find out about East Germany, and that consequently the KGB disposed of a vast amount of expendable build-up or throw-away material from East Germany which could be used in support of its double agent operations. responsible for double agents -- can be a useful tool for any type of operation against any type of target, to collect or to disseminate information, and it perfected techniques for supporting and manipulating a well-placed staff penetration of an opposition service. But the degree of support given to Felfe was so great that it presupposed certain additional capabilities. Such extensive support requires:

variety of subjects. This includes information on Soviet targets of interest to the West and information on Soviet and satellite intelligence operations, personnel, and equipment deliberately given to the West to further the source's operation. It also includes willingness to give away information which the Western enemy gathers through its own operations and which the KGB cannot terminate without endangering its source.

As corollaries to these conditions, we see that the KGB is willing to mount whole operations, if necessary, in order to maneuver a source or to protect him, and that for any given step of deception, careful attention is paid to providing the Western agencies with apparent cross-checks and confirmations. The same is true in the KGB defensive tactics, where one can point out numerous cases of a creative use made out of a known Western operation. This is particularly true of Western audio penetrations and of certain double agent operations which are used to feed back items of deception or otherwise to divert us from our course.

It is obvious that Felfe would never have survived as long as he did without many helping hands, both witting and unwitting, in the RMD and in other German agencies. What really saved him was that in the West it took investigators so long to put reason to the test; that it took the fortuitous appearance of a defector, or source-in-place, to start the investigation which the extraordinarily accurate security analysis of 1957 had indicated was urgently necessary. When the detective work did begin it was a brilliant and tightly handled operation.

The DID has taken to heart the and lessons learned from this case and has made vigorous efforts to improve and protect its security. Although historical developments of the last 25 years inevitably make the German services more vulnerable to penetration than other Western European services, one should note that since 1961 the DMD has faced this problem squarely. The determined efforts of a small group of the BPD's most competent younger officers have been focussed on this problem, and much progress has been made in detecting and removing officers who because of their wartime background or for other to sone fall into categories classed as security risks. The problem of Soviet penetration is by no means limited to the German services, but must be faced by DI services, as is amply demonstrated by the previously successful penetration by Soviet or Bloc intelligence of 11-6, SENCE, and U.S. military intelligence and security services as well as the DED.

The HACKE Story

At the end of 1943, Nazi Party boss Martin Bormann foresaw the approaching defeat of the Third Reich and began to build up a secret Nazi cadre organization unknown to Hitler and other Nazi leaders. This organization has come to be known in Western intelligence circles under the codeword HACKE.* According to Bormann's plan, HACKE was set up according to the "V" pattern (5 persons): members of one "V" became leaders of further "V"s, and the leadership was anonymous to the lower circles. It was to be numerically limited, but expanded as needed. Its objective was to exercise clandestine influence over affairs of the Third Reich, and to prepare the groundwork for continued activity after the defeat. In early 1944 there were allegedly only 35 members; by the end of that year, a half million dollars in concentration camp booty had been smuogled abroad and clandestine bases had been set up in Spain, Portugal, Argentina, Japan and Italy. HACKE members were quite different from those who opposed Hitler on more or less moral grounds and who organized the attempted assassination of Hitler on 20 July 1944. They were war criminals, fanatics and far-sighted opportunists who saw the handwriting on the wall and moved early to assure their personal future. To the extent that ideology as well as opportunism played a role, their militance and authoritarianism brought them far closer to Communism than to Western democracy. After the war, HACKE kept alive the old Hazi slogan. "Fight the Jews and plutocrats in the USA," and its goal was the founding of a Fourth Reich.

Typical of Soviet capabilities in this milieu, is the fact that the Soviets learned of HACKE at its inception. Bormann consulted with Gestapo Chief Heinrich Mueller concerning the organization, both for ^{}This codename was originally coined by Michal Goleniewski for use in reporting on this subject while he was still in place as a CIA penetration of the Polish Intelligence Service. advice on conspiratorial organization and to gain Mueller's protection vis-a-vis SS Chief Himmler, who was an enemy of Bormann and who Bormann feared might learn of the organization. Gestapo Chief Mueller, in turn, was already in contact with the Soviets at least as early as the beginning of 1944, and he informed them of Bormann's plan. The Soviet operation with Mueller was directed personally by Gen. Abakumov, then Chief of SMERSH, and subsequently head of the entire MGB, predecessor of the KCB. Abakumov immediately recognized the importance of HACKE and did everything possible to penetrate the organization and direct it toward long range Soviet goals. Mueller's knowledge of HACKE was limited. He was only used by Bormann; he was not fully trusted nor was he a member of HACKE himself. But his knowledge was sufficient to identify other members of the organization, and without waiting for the end of the war, Abakumov rectuited several HACKE members by blackmail and threat of denunciation to Hitler and Himmler.

One member of HACKE with whom the Soviets reportedly were in touch during the war is SS Colonel Otto Skorzeny, who is famous for leading the airborn rescue of Mussolini from Allied imprisonment. Skorzeny was under active development by Abakumov's unit as early as 1942. He was suspected for a while of playing a double game, but was reportedly firmly recruited by the Soviets in mid-1944. For a brief period shortly before the end of the war, Skorzeny was maneuvered into position as chief of Nazi military intelligence. Through Skorzeny, Abakumov hoped to catch in time and exploit for Soviet purposes the Nazi Abwehr ^{*}Mueller was well-known as a student and admirer of the NKVD, and this apparently led him to general sympathy with the Soviet cause. In his memoires, Gen. Walter Schellenberg, a senior SS and SD officer, quotes Mueller as saying in Spring 1943: "I cannot help it; I incline more and more to the conviction that Stalin is on the right road. He is immensely superior to the Western heads of state, and if I had anything to say about it we would very quickly come to an agreement with him." It was not long after this that Mueller apparently did make his own personal accommodation with the Soviets. The Soviet contact to him was reportedly arranged by Maj. Loelgen, the Gestapo chief in Danzig, who had been recruited by the Soviets sometime in 1943. Mueller's post-war whereabouts is a much-debated mystery. It was first believed that he died in the siege of Berlin, but there have been a number of reports that he escaped successfully to the Soviet Union.

agents in the U.S. and South America.* It is not known for certain whether Skorzeny is still a Soviet agent. Deryabin tells us the KGB was trying to locate him in 1952, perhaps to reestablish contact. He is presently living in Spain, from where he maintains active contact with wartime friends and associates.

After the war, the Soviets concentrated on maximum investigation of HACKE and maximum infiltration of agents into its membership. The organization expanded in 1947-48, and this opportunity was exploited. Several war criminals who were knowledgeable on HACKE were located in various Eastern European Jails. Goleniewski, for example, has described the two-year effort to break HACKE member Foerster, the former Mazi Gauleiter of Danzig, who had been sentenced to death as a war criminal in Poland. It was Goleniewski himself, who in mid-1952 after six months of patient debriefing and persuasion, finally induced Foerster to reveal what he knew about HACKE. In this case, as in a number of others, Goleniewski operated on direct instructions from the Soviets, wholly independent of his own Polish service. As soon as Foerster began to talk about HACKE, he was immediately removed from prison and flown to Moscow in a special plane. Our only source of direct knowledge on HACKE is Goleniewski, and most of Goleniewski's knowledge comes from his involvement in the Foerster case and subsequent discussion with KGB officers who specialized in German operations. Deryabin has provided circumstantial confirmation, however. He reports that the voluminous files on Abakumov's wartime operations against high level Nazis were known in the KGB as "Abakumov's legacy," and that they read like a novel. There was renewed interest in these files about November 1952 (i.e. after Foerster began talking about HACKE); at that time the files were removed from the Austro-German Section to a separate location, and a high degree of compartmentation was put into effect with regard to all files pertaining to former Nazi officers.

The HACKE story is regarded as an important backdrop to understanding post-war German security problems, and particularly to an understanding of Soviet penetration of German intelligence and security services as illustrated by the Felfe case. It shows how early in the game and with what success the Soviets moved to penetrate and exploit the various formal and informal groupings of former Nazis. Former SS and SD officers were particularly vulnerable to Soviet blackmail, as the Soviets systematically sought out and exploited the evidence of their war crimes guilt. In this group for which conspiracy had become a way of life, the Soviets could also make an ideological appeal -- continued hatred of the United States combined with respect for authoritarian Soviet power. Many of these former Nazi officers, including some with a record of hushed-up war crimes, obtained important or sensitive positions in the West German government. This group exercised a particularly fatal attraction on the renascent West German intelligence and security services, which had an obvious need for experienced personnel to counter the growing threat of Soviet espionage.

The LILLI MARLEN Case

Using information gathered (we believe) by several penetrations of Gehlen's CE branches, the KGB prepared a comprehensive document on the personnel, organization and operations of GV"L". The document had the appearance of a report from an agent in place in GV"L" or near the chief of GV"L" and was signed with the name "Artur." The content was genuine and implied a real Soviet penetration or penetrations, but there were some discrepancies in the use of organizational terminology which suggested that the document itself might be a fabrication. The document was photographed on microfilm and the microfilm placed in a dead drop at the base of a lamp post in the West German city of Ludwigsburg by an agent whom we have never identified.

The document was brought to the attention of West German police by a KGB agent who was briefed to report to the police that he had accidentally discovered the dead drop. Another KGB agent was briefed to empty the dead drop and in doing so, unwittingly, to walk into the police stake-out, be arrested and thus provide confirmation of the existence of a Soviet penetration in GV"L". The account of the recruitment, preparation and handling of these two agents (drawn largely from their confessions) provides some excellent examples of tactical deception techniques. In general it should be noted that both agents were of very low calibre - too low to possibly be used in any real intelligence operation; both had already been blown in one capacity or another to various Western intelligence agencies.

The KGB presumably used them in the LILLI MARLEN operation not only in spite of their low agent quality but because of it!

The Agents:

"The Informer": Bodo Fromm, born in 1915, was a former Wehrmacht Lieutenant from the Dresden area. He joined the Fighting Group against Inhumanity in early 1951, was caught distributing leaflets in East Germany and recruited by the KGB in Dresden. Fromm continued to work for the Dresden KGB office as a penetration of the Fighting Group and and staged a "flight" to West Berlin when the Soviets arrested his colleagues. Subsequently he tried, on Soviet instruction, but without success, to get agent work with the French, the British and the Americans in West Berlin. Later he was able to operate as a penetration of the Committee for Liberation from Totalitarianism, a group which was eventually taken over by the Gehlen Organization. At this point Fromm was introduced to a new case officer in Berlin who told him that his targets were the BfV and the Gehlen Organization. In the fall of 1953 all the West German agents whom Fromm had been able to identify to the Soviets were arrested in the Soviet Zone (except one - so that Fromm might not be suspect), and Fromm was ordered to move from West Berlin to West Germany where he was to await further instructions.

"The Throw-Away": Walter Kunde, born in 1908 in Berlin, was a periodically unemployed salesman. In 1950 and 1951 Kunde worked for the British in Berlin, but was dropped on charges of being a swindler and a fabricator. While employed in a West Berlin department store in 1951 and 1952, Kunde made the acquaintance of an East Berlin customer named Rolf Rhodin. Rhodin was an old German Communist Party member from Dresden, a long time Soviet and MfS principal agent, spotter and recruiter. He was already documented in the files of various Western intelligence services. (Of interest in connection with the LILLI MARLEN case is the fact that Rhodin had also appeared in the case of Wolfgang Higher, a Soviet penetration of one of Gy"L"'s sub-bases in Berlin who had returned to the East through a staged kidnapping in 1953, and who could very well have provided some of the information contained in the LILLI MARLEN document.)

Kunde lost his job in mid-1952 and was destitute for the next year and a half. In late November 1953 he accidentally met Rhodin on the street; he told Rhodin his troubles and accepted Rhodin's offer of help in return for "favors," to be specified at a later date. Kunde thought at the time that Rhodin was referring to matters connected with East-West trading. Between November 1953 and mid-May 1954, Rhodin met Kunde fairly often without making any specific points, but was apparently assessing him closely.

The Operation:

As of spring 1954 both Fromm and Kunde were on call for the KGB's CE section. Fromm was a completely initiated Soviet agent and was in direct contact with KGB officers. Kunde knew only Rhodin and had no precise idea of whom or what Rhodin represented. Neither agent knew the other.

In mid-May 1954 Fromm received a summons from the KGB to come from West Germany to Karlshorst for a meeting. Rhodin at the same time called on Kunde and told him to prepare himself to make a trip to West Germany. (Kunde had to apply for the appropriate travel documents.) On 24 May Fromm met his case officer in Karlshorst and was told that in the near future he was to receive instructions to do something (not specified) within a 50 km. radius of his home in Stuttgart. The case officer gave Fromm instructions in S/W, a cipher, and open code signals to be used for making meeting arrangements.

On the 10th of June 1954, Fromm received a telegram summoning him again to Karlshorst, but Fromm was unable to travel until the 17th. He let four days go by, however, before he informed the KGB of this fact. In the meantime Rhodin had told Kunde to keep in very close touch with him since he was waiting daily for a telegram from West Germany which would give him some idea of when Kunde could make his trips. Kunde had his travel documents ready by the 11th of June.

On 17 June 1954 Fromm arrived in Karlshorst for his meeting with the KGB case officers. They were annoyed that he had not been able to come earlier and said that Fromm's task concerned a very important matter which had "already cost many thousands of marks." It was crucial that Fromm be in Ludwigsburg on 18 June at precisely 0700 hours. Fromm was then given his mission: he was to look for a minox box concealed at the base of a certain lamp post. If he found it he was to leave it there and go punctually at 0800 to the Chief of the Ludwigsburg police and tell him the story of seeing a man put something near the base of the lamp post. He was to give a plausible excuse for being at that spot himself early in the morning and was to say that the man had acted suspiciously, making Fromm suspect some spying activity. The Soviets also gave Fromm a physical description for the man, which they said was notional and which he could relay to the police. Fromm was to be sure to report only to the Chief of the Ludwigsburg Police, since he was known to be very pro-American and would certainly inform American agencies and have the dead drop surveilled.

The Soviet case officers further explained that another man would empty the dead drop, would be arrested and would confess that he worked for the Soviets in Karlshorst. (Here they relied on Rhodin's personal assessment of Kunde's character.) As soon as From had completed this assignment he was to send a report to Rolf Rhodin.

While Fromm was being thus briefed, Kunde was meeting with Rhodin. Rhodin explained that the matter of Kunde's trip to West Germany (task still unspecified) would become acute two days later, on the 19th of June. Rhodin would meet Kunde on the morning of the 19th and give him the exact details of his mission.

On the 18th of June Fromm arrived in Ludwigsburg, found the minox in its cache as predicted and reported to the Chief of Police at 0800 precisely as instructed. Later in the day he returned to Stuttgart and sent his report to Rhodin. On the 19th Rhodin informed Kunde how to travel to Ludwigsburg and where to find the dead drop. He instructed Kunde to empty it between 0600 and 0700 on Monday, 21 June. He then told Kunde that he should wrap up the film capsule and mail it to his own address in West Berlin, then return to Berlin and give the package to Rhodin on either the 22nd or the 24th of June, when Rhodin would meet him. He promised Kunde a reward of a new suit, a pair of shoes and full set of dentures. Kunde was given no advice about what to say if he was picked up by the West German police. The bewildered man was arrested exactly according to Soviet expectations and willingly told all he knew about his contact with Rhodin.

Not according to KGB plan, however, was the fact that Fromm was an unconvincing actor and aroused the suspicions of the Ludwigsburg police when he made his first report about accidentally finding the deaddrop. Also contrary to Soviet hopes was the initial Gehlen Organization reaction to the LILLI MARLEN document; owing to errors in the use of organizational terminology, it suspected Soviet deception. Surveillance and mail intercept coverage was instituted on Fromm, and he was detected mailing a letter to Rolf Rhodin in East Berlin. This was evidence of a direct link between Fromm and Kunde and the KGB. Fromm was eventually arrested and confessed his role in the Soviet deception.

The Sokolov Case: An example of tactical deception.

The Sokolov case is an excellent illustration of Soviet techniques for manipulating circumstances and events without the opposition's knowledge. The KGB's primary purpose in this operation probably was to investigate (and eventually to arrest) an insecure and potentially treasonous RU officer (Sokolov) stationed in Erfurt, East Germany. accomplishing this objective, the Soviets also succeeded in: (1) tieing up the investigative assets of two German and several American services; (2) manipulating the case so as to involve one service (the BND) not originally connected with the case, but in which the KGB had a penetration agent (Felfe) who could monitor the case for them; (3) causing the Western services to create an inter-service liaison task force, which could be exploited by the KGB to monitor the activity of all Western services involved in the case; and (4) creating an illusion of security and productive endeavor within the Western services. Specific Soviet tactics included throwing away seemingly valuable agents and equipment; dangling attractive, or potentially attractive, tidbits of information; and prolonging the case by causing it to suddenly take a new and intriguing turn - usually just when the opposition's interest seemed to be lagging or when it appeared that the operation was about to be terminated.

The wrap-up of the Sokolov case in the fall of 1960 was regarded at the time in Western intelligence circles as a Western coup and a tribute to the efficacy of German-American operational liaison. In the light of hindsight, however, we have come to realize that it was, in fact, the Soviets who pulled all the strings. The original Western goal was to recruit a Soviet intelligence officer, Sokolov. Somewhere along the line (as a result, it is now clear, of Soviet manipulation), this goal became entangled with the attractive prospect of also rolling-up several interrelated intelligence networks involving approximately 200 known or suspect Eastern agents. When all was said and done, however, only five low-level agents had been arrested.

of whom at least four, and figures in the Sokolov case, of whom at least four, and figures five, were under Soviet control from the first:

- (1) Major Sokolov, a GSFG RU Transborder Intelligence Point officer at Erfurt, East Germany, who ran a network targeted against an American airfield at Sembach:
- (2) Karl Heinz-Kiefer, a German railway employee, member of Sokolov's net; who was doubled first by CIC and then turned over to the BfV.
- (3) Bruno Droste, a refugee from Erfurt who worked for the Soviets and was ostensibly doubled by CIA;
- (4) Lore Poehlmann, a long-time Soviet and MfS agent who served as principal agent and safehouse keeper for Sokolov, with her husband,
- (5) Waldemar Poehlmann, an RU Transborder Intelligence Point agent; and
- (6) Wilhelm Haller, a BND agent who reported on MfS activities but was almost certainly under Soviet control.

The Soviet case officer, Major Sokolov, had been trying to collect OB data on various US air bases since the early 1950's. Numerous traces on him, under various names, rested in CIC files. The consensus of information indicated that he was an almost unbelievably careless operator: a drunkard, an insecure talker, a flamboyant and promiscuous type, well-known around Erfurt for exactly what he was.

One of Sokolov's longer-lived operations involved a group of low-level West German agents whose main target was the collection of information on the American airfield at Sembach. When one of these agents, a railway employee named Kiefer, confessed and volunteered his services to CIC, the latter promptly doubled him. CIC, apparently suspicious that the Soviets knew that Kiefer was doubled, played the agent cautiously.* (Kiefer, himself, complained that CIC dalliance was causing the Soviets to become suspicious.) Nevertheless, CIC continued to run him from 1954 until March 1959, when, after five years of relatively unproductive activity, they turned the case over to the BfV. CIC recommended that the case be terminated and the network rolled-up.

The BfV, however, was intrigued with the large number of contacts and suspects in the RU net. They were particularly interested in one lead to a W/T agent, who happened to be a relative of Kiefer's, who was in two-way contact with Sokolov. Moreover, the BfV harbored some suspicion that perhaps Kiefer's lack of productivity had resulted from CIC mishandling, and that some of the agents in the network might be salvaged. For these reasons, they decided to follow up some of the leads more carefully before terminating the case.

At this point, the case suddenly began to move. Sokolov took two important steps: he gave Kiefer an OWVL system; and he introduced him to two Erfurt-based agents who ostensibly were to help him recruit a source at the Sembach airfield.

These agents, a married couple named Lore and Waldemar Poehlmann, acted as principal agents and safehouse keepers for Sokolov.

Frau Poehlmann was already a long-time Soviet and MfS agent; her husband had for some time been listed in CIC files as an RU Transborder Intelligence agent. From Sokolov's action, it appeared that he did not toonsider Kiefer to be under Western control.

*Kiefer reported several remarks made by Sokolov's RU chief which suggested that the Soviets might be suspicious that Kiefer was under Western control. Moreover, it is likely that the CIC case officer felt that Sokolov's flamboyant insecurity was a little too good to be true.

There is special significance to Kiefer's being given OWVL just after the BfV took over the case from CIC. We now realize (although we did not at the time) that it is characteristic of the Soviets, in running diversionary operations, to supply agents whom they know or strongly suspect have been doubled by the opposition with sophisticated communications systems. At least as early as 1958, the RU was deliberately continuing to run such cases with increasingly elaborate communications. This is confirmed by information from our penetration of the GRU, Lt. Col. Popov. In July of that year, Popov was discussing with an RU colleague several Transborder cases aimed at Holland. The Soviet remarked to Popov that his "entire Dutch residency had been compromised." Significantly, it was after this conversation that the RU trained one of these agents (Dutch Cryptonym PARKER) in OWVL.*

and CIA took on the job of coordination between the BfV and and OSI on the other.

CIC Chick, in turn, was representing OSI. During the summer Kiefer's information was investigated and a plan was devised for the roll-up of his net sometime in the fall. In September, however, two facts were developed which served to delay this action: (1) CIA discovered that it had an agent already in contact with Sokolov who, apparently, was a member of the same net as Kiefer; and (2) a BND agent appeared who was in a position to provide information on the Poehlmann's.

^{*}In considering the reasons why the RU gave their agents OWVL after they knew them to be controlled by Western services, we surmise that this action served several purposes. It was a new development which whetted the interest of the doubling service and indicated that the agent was well-regarded by the Soviets. At the same time, it provided a measure of protection to the RU, as it allowed them to keep the cases running with a minimum of direct personal contact between case officer and agent. It also allowed a formal contact to be dragged out for a considerable length of time without any real substantive content. For example, the number of Kiefer's OWVL broadcasts consisting simply of a call-up signal and a negative message indicator is impressive. So is the number of breadcasts which were unintelligible for technical reasons.

The CIA agent was one Bruno Droste, a refugee from Erfurt of obscure loyalties, who was then giving music lessons to Americans in Frankfurt. To one of his pupils, an American officer, he offered information about a Soviet intelligence officer named "Starov" with whom he was in contact in Erfurt. Droste described "Starov" as a remarkably insecure drunkard, who ran operations against US installations in Wiesbaden. Contrary to CIA orders to disregard Soviet attempts to contact him, Droste met "Starov" in a safehouse in Karlshorst, East Berlin, in September 1959. From Droste's description of this encounter, "Starov" was identified as Sokolov. At the same time, it was also discovered that Droste had earlier reported having seen blank East German residency permits in "Starov's" safehouse which were signed with the name "Kiefer." This information led to the conclusion that Droste and Kiefer might be part of the same net. Droste, consequently, was turned over for handling to the BfV.

The other development involved a resident of Erfurt named Haller. Haller had been spotted by another BND agent in Erfurt who reported that Haller would be amenable to recruitment and that he could provide information on MfS activities. Haller was easily recruited and proved to be a prolific source of information on Frau Poehlmann. In September 1959, Haller stated that the Poehlmann's were both MfS and Soviet agents. A short time later, he reported that Frau Poehlmann was working for a Soviet intelligence officer named Sokolov, and that the two were having an affair. This report that Frau Poehlmann was being run by the Soviets rather than by the MfS caused her case to be turned over by the BND's MfS section to the direct control of Felfe in the Soviet CE section. In mid-November, Haller reported that Frau Poehlmann was going to West Germany for a 'holiday." Then the BND, under Felfe's direction, began to mount an operation against Frau Poehlmann, to use her as a means of access to Sokolov.

Meanwhile, Sokolov had continued to contact Droste.

CIA and the BfV had decided to try to decided Sokolov's defection through Droste during the roll-up of Sokolov's net which was then planned for December. Until this time, there had been no official coordination between the BND and the BfV, at is considered quite likely that although, Felfe was quite likely that advised informally through his contacts within the BfV. It was not until the BND submitted a priority namecheck request on the Poehlmann's to the BfV. CIA and CIC that it came into the open that all services were working on the same target.

in detecting Sokolovs Frau Poehlmann was at the time, according to Haller, in the Federal Republic, taking a rest cure. A BND man, Richard Schweizer, acting on Haller's information, had contacted her on her arrival in West Germany and had easily established a liaison with her.* He reported that he found Frau Poehlmann more than approachable; that, in fact, she seemed to go about the business of being promiscuous as though it were a duty.

About the same time, another event of interest occurred: the BfV reported that Kiefer had been able to improve his previously somewhat strained relations with his relative; the W/T operator; it seemed that he might be able to get some useful information on the network's communications system.

At this point, it appeared that there were perhaps too many plums just within reach: for CIA, an RU case officer; for the BfV, a net with W/T operating inside West Germany; for the BND, a clutch of East German agents. Everyone agreed to slow down. The BND proposed a general coordinating conference, and on 11 February 1960 representatives of the three services met in Cologne to discuss further procedures. It was decided that coordination at the respective headquarters would be supplemented by daily operational coordination by the various case officers from the three services. (As a measure of the Soviet success in tieing up Western assets, it should be noted that one CIA officer was engaged full time for six months on this one liaison operation.)

Throughout the spring and early summer the three-way coordination worked in high-gear. The basic agreement was that "no service will undertake any action...without coordinating...with the other services concerned...[and]... there will be a free and full exchange of information..." By July 1960, the number of identified and suspect agents radiating from Kiefer, other members of his net, from Droste, the Poehlmanns, and from Haller, amounted to some 200 people located in 11 West German cities and in East Berlin and East Germany. Moreover, the criscrossing of trace information seemed to imply overlaps with GRU, KGB, East German, Polish cases, and even with one or two Algerian FLN operations in West Germany. With rare exceptions, however, these people offered poor material for intelligence work and little or no relevance to the goal of recruiting Sokolov.

In mid-July, Sokolov again sent Frau Poehlmann to West Germany. There, she came into close operational contact with Kiefer, who thought that she was definitely defectable. More important, he reported that she had quoted Sokolov as being willing to accept American asylum rather than return to the USSR for retirement in September. The coordinating committee decided to move to recruit Frau Poehlmann at once. If she would not help to defect Sokolov, she would be arrested, Sokolov would be approached by letter, and his West German agents would be arrested.

that she considered Sokolov to be immoral and insincere, and claimed that he had expressed "Western tendencies."

She agreed to work as a double agent, but it soon became apparent that she was confessing only as much as her interrogators already seemed to know. She was judged unreliable and was formally arrested on 25 July, but even after this, she agreed to write to Sokolov endorsing our defection invitation.*

Our letter was mailed to her husband for delivery to Sokolov.

On 27 July the roll-up of Sokolov's net began, starting with a tentative list, compiled on the basis of Kiefer's information, of 23 persons. The W/T operator was among the first. Some ten days later, both Kiefer's OWVL and the W/T operator's communications system were still producing messages from the East - indicating, to all appearances, that the RU was still in the dark.

In early August, Haller reported that Herr Poehlmann had been unable to deliver the letter to Sokolov because the latter was out of town. Meanwhile, when Frau Poehlmann didn't return from her trip to the health resort, her husband opened the letter, thinking it might offer some clue to her whereabouts. Although he couldn't read the Russian text, he recognized that a telephone number in it (the one through which Sokolov was to contact an American officer) was located in West Berlin. Aided by Haller (who claimed he was helping Poehlmann because Poehlmann was partially deaf), Poehlmann called the number, and by this means came into direct contact with CIA's Berlin Base. Poehlmann agreed to cooperate with the West. Poehlmann and Haller reported that Sokolov had been in an auto accident, but that he was due to be released soon from the hospital. CIA gave him a second letter for Sokolov. Three weeks later Poehlmann reported that Sokolov still had not reappeared.

At this point, the consensus at the Berlin Base was that the effort to defect Sokolov was probably not going to succeed. The Base officers had begun to be sensented chary of both Haller and Poehlmann. Although they felt that Poehlmann was probably sincere in his relations with us, they doubted the truth of his story about the letter to Sokolov, and they thought that he well might be being monitored by the Soviets. With regard to Haller, from their discussions with BND case officers, the Base concluded that the BND had not checked out Haller very well, and that their control over him was very loose. Although they had no firm evidence that he was controlled by the MfS or the Soviets, they felt that he was perhaps lying about his personal affairs.

on 17 September, Frau Haller appeared in West Berlin and reported to BND officers that Poehlmann had learned that Sokolov had gone to Moscow, but was expected back in two months. Sokolov, of course, never reappeared. On 2 October, the Hallers requested refugee status in Berlin. Haller reported that Herr Poehlmann had been questioned in late September by the MfS about his relations with Sokolov. He claimed that he himself had also been questioned by the MfS about his Western connections, but that he had been released for lack of evidence. Later, after receiving word from his brother that the MfS no longer considered him a "Western spy," Haller returned home. CIA opposed this move, but the BND, thinking that he might provide further leads to MfS operations in Erfurt, encouraged it.

Felfe's role in the Sokolov case was unusually passive (for Felfe.) His first official exposure to it occurred in the fall of 1959 when he received an official briefing on the case from the BfV.* It is likely, however, that he had heard about the case informally several months earlier, when Kiefer was first turned over from CIA to the BfV. In February 1960, Felfe was one of the three officers who represented the BND at the coordinating committee meeting in Cologne. His German colleagues later remarked that his behavior on that occasion, as well as in Subsequent liaison, was somewhat unusual. Instead of railing at them for their incompetence, as was his custom, he allowed the BfV free rein in handling the Kiefer side of the affair. The Poehlmann contact was run solely by a BND office. Folfo's only really aggressive action was to insist that if Kiefer were arrested, the action should be taken in such a way that neither Pochlmann, Haller, or Droste would be endangered. (Thus all of these persons could continue as KGB diversionary assets. In his directives to the Frankfurt field office, Felfe represented as BND consensus his opinion that the Kiefer net should be kept going as long as possible so that Sokolov could be recruited. (This approach was contrary to CIA's idea, which was to force Sokolov's defection by arresting his agents.)

Western success, it is now clear that the results were, in fact, far less than had been anticipated. In the end, of all the 200 agent leads, only five individuals were arrested.

Moreover, it was found that these persons had simply been collecting USAF newspapers, phone directories, and making low-level OB observations. Although two W/T sets* as well as photographic and coding materials, were taken from the W/T operator, there was actually little indication that he had supplied the RU with any sensitive information on U.S. forces.

*One of these was supposed to have been the "newest" kind of high speed transmitter, but by this time the GRU knew this equipment had already been compromised by Popov.

This series of operational events, comprising the Sokolov case, was hailed at the time as a major success. The BfV was delighted with the publicity resulting from its arrest of five (albeit minor) agents. The BND was left with the expectation of further MfS leads. CIA was impressed by the proof that close operational liaison with the German services could be effective and amicable. CIC and OSI found out that Sokolov had done less damage than had been supposed. It was only after Felfe's arrest that we learned (from Felfe himself -- a man who couldn't resist bragging occasionally) that the KGB had paid him a rare 1,000 DM bonus for his contribution to this Soviet "failure."

ZUVERSICHT Case

This case summary illustrates certain problems of source protection.

The KGB learned from Felfe, or possibly from another penetration of the BND, that an agent of the RU had been doubled. The KGB informed the RU of this fact, but requested that the RU continue to run the agent in order to protect the KGB source. Our source for this information was at CIA penetration of the GRU.

Officer of the RU at the time. The RU did continue to run the operation as requested, but only in the most nominal way. Not having guite the same operational interest in the matter, its handling was reduced to the Longly with the KGB request yet barest minimum so as to provide protection of their own assets.

ZUVERSICHT (BND cryptonym) was a West German Merchant Marine Captain, who was recruited in 1951 by the then RU Naval Point in Karlshorst while on a visit to his family in East Germany. When he returned to West Germany he reported the recruitment to the Criminal Police and was eventually turned over to the BfV. For four years, 1953 to 1957, ZUVERSICHT was run by the BfV (which used the cryptonym SEEBAER) as a double agent. MI-6 (cryptonym ILLUSTRIOUS) acted as advisor on the case from about May 1954 on. During this period ZUVERSICHT joined the West German Navy (Bundeswehr Marine) at RU urging. The RU gave him S/W, dead drops, OWVL and promised to instruct him in a new kind of W/T. When it was determined, however, that ZUVERSICHT would not be able to obtain a commission in the Navy (because of his agent status), he decided to resign and enter the Merchant Marine. At this point, since the agent's activities would undoubtedly take place outside the Federal Republic, his case was transferred to the BND. This occurred formally in September 1957, but the BMD received detailed operational briefings on the case in mid-July.

In July 1957 the RU case officer requested ZUVERSICHT to meet him in Vienna in August. On 24 July the BND held a conference with the BfV on plans for the meeting. The BND offered the use of their Vienna based surveillance personnel to the BfV and proposed the photographing of the RU case officer. The BfV later decided to reject this offer and to use its own personnel. Shortly before the meeting the BfV surveillance personnel were instructed not to attempt to photograph the RU officer. The BfV and BND also agreed that ZUVERSICHT should not yet inform the RU officer that he was transferring to the Merchant Marine, because they feared that the RU might lose interest in giving him the new W/T training if they kenw this. The meeting took place as scheduled, but, contrary to BfV hopes, the RU officer informed ZUVERSICHT that he would not have W/T training after all, but would henceforth work through a dead drop, which would be serviced by a W/T operator he never met.

Shortly after this, in September 1957, Lt. Col. Popov informed us that this RU officer was Captain Yuriy Pavlovich Sklavets of the Naval operational group in Karlshorst and that his case had recently been discussed at a routing RU officers' meeting. At this meeting it was announced that the KGB had recently informed the RU Naval group that Sklavets' agent was doubled and that Sklavets had been photographed by a Western CI service during his meeting in Vienna.* The KGB requested the RU to keep on running it in order to protect the KGB source.

After ZUVERSICHT's return from Vienna, he informed the RU of his impending transfer to the Merchant Marine. He told them that his office in the Bundeswehr Marine was undergoing a security & review and that he had taken fright and decided to resign and go back into the Merchant Marine. This story had been concocted - an actual security review was staged - by the BfV and the BND in order to avoid giving the RU the real reason for the transfer and in order to provide an excuse for the abrupt notification. The RU replied to ZUVERSICHT by ordering him to stop operating and to send his family to East Germany, but by the time the letter reached ZUVERSICHT's home address he was already on the Atlantic bound for a year's duty in Mexico.

^{*}This was a clear indication of staff penetration, as only a penetration could have known of the original plan to photograph the case officer, which was in fact never implemented. It also gave some indication of the position and knowledgeability of the penetration, i.e. he the knew of the plan but was unaware of its cancellation.

After the meeting with Sklavets in Vienna in 1957, ZUVERSICHT had no further personal contact with the RU; he received no EEI. Messages were few and far between and inevitably timed to arrive in his home port just after ZUVERSICHT's ship had put out on a cruise of many months.

The method of communication became more and more "insecure," The RU officer simply wrote a letter using ordinary postal channels and a very simple open code. The only sign of assertiveness was one request that ZUVERSICHT try to get a berth on a ship putting in to Baltic ports!

Felfe kept his end of the game up with characteristic style. He frequently elaborated on the theme that the RU is generally an incompetent organization (as indeed it seemed in this case), and he had ZUVERSICHT write a letter of complaint to his RU case officer criticizing him for the insecure communications and generally shabby treatment. The ZUVERSICHT case ran in this manner until 19611

MERKATOR Case

Whereas ZUVERSICHT illustrates a situation in which later a doubled agent and did it with the least effort possible, giving itself the appearance of great incompetence, the MERKATOR case shows a more creative reaction to the presence of a double agent. The more purposeful handling is probably attributable to the fact that MERKATOR was an agent of the East German foreign intelligence (MfS/HVA) and as such more directly controllable by a KGB advisor.

MERKATOR was a student at Bonn University in 1957 and worked part time as a waiter at state receptions. He was spotted by an MfS/HVA agent in the CDU/Ost (Section of the Christian Democratic Party for East Germany) and recruited for the East German service in East Berlin in January 1957 (HVA cover name OFEN) to report on security precautions at state receptions in Bonn. Ito spot agent candidates among personnel concerned with the organization of receptions, handling of hotel accommodations (for the purpose of making audio installations), etc. He was put in contact with an HVA resident in West Germany. MERKATOR turned himself in to security authorities and the BfV subsequently ran him as a double in what they considered a good and productive operation.

Not long after MERKATOR's doubling, Felfe paid a visit to some BfV colleagues and was briefed off-the-record about the case because it was so interesting. Felfe was told he could mention the case informally at BND headquarters. About six months after this, about mid-1958, the operation underwent a major change. What happened was subsequently explained to us by MERKATOR's HVA case officer, Max Heim, who defected to the West in May 1959. Heim reported that just when he thought his operation was going very well, the Soviet advisor to the HVA approached him and informed him that his agent had been "doubled by Gehlen" (sic). Heim had then been instructed to turn his agent over to another section (Heim specialized in operations against the Christian Democratic and Christian Social Union parties) which would continue to run the case as an operation known to be controlled by a Western service. At this point the HVA objectives in the operation were changed, the HVA principal agent who had been supporting MERKATOR in West Germany was withdrawn, and future communications were handled through personal contacts in East Berlin.

NO FOREST SECTION

The revised objective of the operation was to pass diversionary leads which was thought by the HVA to be the controlling apposition servee. and disinformation to the BND, The HVA endeavored to sow seeds of distrust within the BND concerning the governmental office www. under which it functioned, i.e. the office of the State Secretary in the Chancellor's Office, by generating the suspicion that the senior official in this office was an East German agent. The HVA also tried to further aggravate the x distrust between the BND and the BfV, by giving the BND further "proof" that the BfV was penetrated. MERKATOR was given the assignment to obtain information about a specific BfV officer, and in the course of discussing the assignment the HVA case officer implied the BfV officer was already cooperating with the East but was not fully trusted. Political disinformation was also channeled through MERKATOR. The operation was far less effective than it might have been, as the KGB erred in telling the HVA MERKATOR had been doubled by "Gehlen." The doubling service was actually the BfV rather than the BND, so some of the disinformation missed its mark.* For example, the BfV reaction to MERKATOR's report that one of Als officers was an HVA agent was far different than the BND reaction would have been to the same report. Although the BfV was concerned about the implications of MERKATOR's reports and investigated them, it viewed the sudden changes in the MERKATOR operation with some reservation. The operation was broken off after Heim's defection in May 1959.

^{*}There are several possible plausible explanations of the KGB error.

^{}In connection with Heim's defection, there was an interesting development in the PANOPTIKUM case, which Felfe had taken over about that time. In July 1959, the PANOPTIKUM double agent, General Panzinger, received a KGB requirement via OWVL to find out if Heim had been a BNO or a BfV agent in place prior to his defection. This was a totally unrealistic requirement for General Panzinger, as it was not the type of information he had access to at all, but the requirement could serve Felfe as an excuse to inquire into the Heim case.
