PROSPECT FOR NEW EXILE ATTACKS ON HAITI

The successful three-week incursion of Haiti in June and July by a rebel exile group from the Dominican Republic may encourage more attacks in the near future. Indeed, plans for further exile operations are well advanced, [redacted]

[redacted] Moreover, there are indications that exiles other than those located in the Dominican Republic may provide financial backing for these new "invasions." Such unusual cohesion in Haitian exile circles would add a new dimension to the struggle against the Duvalier dictatorship.

The rebels who operated in Haiti apparently caused little physical damage, but they did inflict a psychological defeat on the Duvalier forces. The failure to come to grips with the rebels has undermined the regime's confidence in its ability to deal with future challenges of this nature. Also, the confusion that marked the antirebel operations, together with anti-Duvalier demonstrations in the southern town of Jacmel, caused increased friction between the armed forces and the militia.

Although it is difficult to gauge, anti-Duvalier sentiment seems to be growing among some disgruntled military elements. The thrust of current rumors in Port-au-Prince is that the armed forces, disgusted with Duvalier's recent actions, are planning to move against him.

Duvalier, meanwhile, is continuing his efforts to obtain military equipment from abroad to assuage the dissatisfaction among his troops over their meager and antiquated weapons.
