Haiti: A small, well-armed rebel force landed on the southeastern coast of Haiti on the afternoon of 29 June. The rebels, who allegedly came from the Dominican Republic, plan to start blowing up bridges and police posts sometime this week. There have been two other unconfirmed landings--one on the southwestern tip of the country and one in the northwest,

Although the Haitian military establishment can handle the rebels, it will be hard pressed if reports of the second and third landings turn out to be true. The rugged mountains in the southeastern area will be advantageous to the invaders. The most the rebels can hope for, however, is to remain in the mountains and carry out hit-and-run guerrilla attacks. In any event, the Duvalier dictatorship does not appear to be in any immediate danger.
